Over the years, a lot of focus on care and recovery has shifted from hospitals to the home. Today, Rock said, one in five women aged 35 to 55 delivers home care to someone every day. Of those women, half work outside the home.

"Yet insurance has not kept up," he noted.

One reason for that has been federal budget cuts. Over the past four years, Ottawa has slashed health transfer payments to the provinces from $18.5 billion a year to $11.1 billion.

Now, the yearly transfer is up to $12.5 billion, "and that will be the cash floor from now on," he said.

Another $150 million has been set aside for a "health transition fund" that will examine primary care reforms, especially home care and pharmacare. Rock said Ottawa will begin spending that money in the new year.

"Stability" in Canada's health care system has been "restored."

At the same time, the anxiety felt by Canadians about health care "is at an all-time high."

Health care is a government "monopoly" in Canada and if Canadians lose faith in the system, "they will withdraw their support for the monopoly."

But he said the health care system "is worth fixing and worth fighting to fix."

Rock said he rejects a private, parallel system, and one way to avoid that is to make the public system so good, there's no demand for a private one.

JIAS job often humbling

TORONTO — Melanie Kazman, administrative assistant for Jewish Immigrant Aid Services' (JIAS) Community Integration Program, finds her job humbling.

"I spend a lot of time around people whose lives have been uprooted and I try to imagine what it would be like. It's difficult indeed to start one's life over."

Kazman's job includes helping run such programs as Family to Family, which matches Canadian and Russian families. Part of that program includes encouraging Canadian families who are making seders and Rosh Hashanah or Shabbat dinners to invite Russian families who would like the Jewish experience.

"As well, we have the telephone language companion program which joins one Russian immigrant with a Canadian who is willing to talk on the phone. Ideally, the pair form a relationship but the mandate of the program is to help the Russian learn English."

The Community Integration Program, says Kazman, works with Jewish Women's Federation to plan special events such as musical evenings. "We also offer summer camp, Judaism classes, English as a second language and summer programs for youth. There is always something going on for those interested in taking part."

Kazman, who started working at JIAS as a volunteer, teaching English to children, says that now that she is on staff and has been with the agency for awhile, she can see a great improvement in her students' English. "I can see that kids and their parents are a lot more comfortable in their new lives. At first, even coming to our office can be a daunting experience. I see things getting a lot easier for them as they settle in."

Also a student at Centennial College, where she is studying corporate communications and public relations, with a focus on working for a non-profit organization, Kazman says it is important to her to work in the Jewish community.

"I am a graduate of Associated Hebrew Schools and CHAT, and I have been on the March of the Living. I feel that it is important for us as Jews to maintain the Jewish family.

"The two main goals of the Community Integration Program are to integrate immigrants into Canadian society and into the Jewish community, and from what I've seen, we are making a difference. I find it fulfilling to have direct contact with people working hard to start new lives."

You can't ignore reality

If you think of pre-planning only in relation to the sick or the aged, you may be avoiding reality — and a significant opportunity. Pre-planning can be just as important for young healthy parents wanting to protect their families. It's a practical strategy for seniors planning their estate, for singles wanting their affairs handled according to their own wishes or for spouses wishing to relieve their companions of uncertainty.

Pre-planning is now so widely accepted that there are new options coming on stream all the time. To understand the various savings or advantages, we encourage you to call us at 663-9060, ext. 15, for an information package. The right pre-planning decision for you is a well informed one.

We recoil

Robert Latimer was sentenced last week to serve one year in jail and one year less a day of house arrest on his farm for having killed his 12-year-old daughter. This sentence was significantly reduced from the mandatory penalty required by law.

In imposing punishment, Justice G. E. Noble of the court of Queen's Bench of Saskatchewan said, "In my view of the evidence presented in this case, which is for the most part clear and uncontradicted, we have that rare act of homicide that was committed for caring and altruistic reasons. That is why for want of a better term this is called compassionate homicide." (Our emphasis)

Judge Noble was wrong.

To be sure, the facts of the case are difficult, even heart-rending.

Latimer's daughter, Tracy, was born with cerebral palsy. She could neither walk nor speak. She needed constant, ongoing care and treatment, which by all accounts, her family had rendered with love, grace and compassion.She had already endured three operations to "alleviate her condition" and was facing the prospect of a fourth surgery to relieve the pain of a regularly displacing hip.

It was at this point that, as Judge Noble wrote, "Robert Latimer took the decision to take the matter of Tracy's pain into his own hands. He considered a number of ways of putting her out of her misery, but finally settled on putting her to sleep with carbon monoxide gas as the most gentle way of accomplishing his goal. We know that on Sunday, Oct. 24, he carried out his plan."

Latimer's plan, of course, was to kill his daughter, or, in Judge Noble's rather polite though grotesquely inaccurate characterization, to "put her to sleep." But it was a "sleep" from which her father intended that she never awake. Nor did she.

In conferring sentence upon Latimer, Judge Noble was moved by Latimer's motives for murdering his daughter, which the judge described as a desire to put Tracy "out of her misery." In our view, the judge erred in doing so.

The anguish of the murderer prior to murdering does not mitigate, nor does it absolve, as Judge Noble's decision seems vaguely to suggest, the culpability of the murdering act.

And what of the life that was taken?

Did her father's assessment that her life was unbearable outweigh Tracy's inherent right and entitlement to that life? Judge Noble's decision again seems vaguely to suggest so.

The national organizations which represent some of Canada's disabled communities were justifiably outraged. "It was an absolute travesty of justice," according to a spokesperson on behalf of The Canadian Association for Community Living.

"We're telling every senior citizen, every quadriplegic, anyone injured in a car accident that their life is of diminished value," said Pat Danforth of the Council of Canadians with Disabilities.

What do we stand for as a society? Is not human life – unqualified, unreserved, unmodified, undifferentiated – the highest of all values?

We do not differentiate or evaluate human life according to the extent of its "misery" to self let alone to others. But that is unmistakably what Latimer's sentence does. It sends the message that Tracy's life was somehow lesser in value. She was severely disabled and the pain she faced through yet another difficult surgery was great. Indeed it was deemed by her father to be so great that he (Our emphasis) decided she should not go on living, whether or not she wanted to. And we will never know if she did or did not want to because no one, not even her father, asked her. Whether her expressed desire to end her own life would have lent more moral weight to her "compassionate homicide" is also problematic. But we offer no opinion on this possibility, for that is not what happened in this case.

"Compassionate homicide" is a neutral but ghoulish euphemism. We recoil at the phrase.

Disappointed in astrology feature

It was dismaying to see the feature, "A Guide to Jewish Horoscopes" (CJN, Oct. 30). The author's thesis is that there exists a long-ignored, ancient "Judaic astrology" – distinct from the astrology of ancient pagans – and that the New Age movement somehow owes its origins to the esoteric practices of our Jewish ancestors. However, her parallels between the 12 signs of the Zodiac and the 12 tribes of Israel are spurious and flimsy.

The truth of the matter is that the "New Age movement" is no less than a resurrection of the old superstitions of the ancient pagans who had no other means to explain the world. It is no less than astonishing that, in the age in which we live, a time when humankind has reached its hitherto highest achievements in science and epistemology, remnants of ancient superstitions in their various manifestations, such as psychic reading, numerology and therapeutic touch, still persist.

As for astrology, there is no reason that the positions of the planets, as viewed from our earth on the background of stars and galaxies situated thousands of light-years away, should have any effect on the events of our lives or on our personalities. Why should they? There are only four fundamental forces in nature, none of which operates over such great distances.

Hollywoodism overlooks value of Jewish religion

Although I enjoyed the screening of Hollywoodism, Jews, Movies and the American Dream, I feel it was lacking in one particular respect. It is almost as though the producer Simcha Jacobovici also was afraid to lift his head too much above the level of society's acceptance of Jews, as he accused the Jews of Hollywood of doing.

Hollywoodism is the myths propagated by the Jewish moguls behind Hollywood, such as democracy (Mr. Smith Goes to Hollywood), the dignity of the common man (The Grapes of Wrath), a land of opportunity even for the little guy (Mickey Rooney stories) and the equality of the races (the war movies always showed token blacks and Jews in every platoon even when the armed forces were in fact segregated).

He ascribed the impetus of the moguls to their reaction to anti-Semitism and the pogroms. That was easy, because it is no longer politically correct to be anti-Semitic. He also gave a passing nod to Jewish family values.

Anti-Semitism is extrinsic to Judaism and family values merely derivative of it. It would have been much more courageous, and in my opinion more accurate, but less politically correct, to ascribe the impetus of the moguls or Hollywoodism to the Jewish religion itself.

Judaism requires of the Jewish people to be a light unto the nations. One of its principal tenets, social justice, is as old as the Torah itself and long pre-dates anti-Semitism. Judaism also gave birth to messianism, the hope for a better future.

The Hollywoodism described by the film is really the Jewish religious teachings of social justice and hope. It is now, thanks to Hollywoodism, the American dream.

Human soap handed out at Auschwitz

Re: Soap From Auschwitz (CJN, Nov. 12). I recall very vividly the time when the soap made from human remains was handed out in the barracks in Auschwitz. It had a terrible stench, very yellow color and small size.

When I realized that the soap was made from human remains, I disposed of it immediately; some inmates did not, as there was no way to have another bar of soap.

It is my understanding from conversations with other inmates that the soap was processed in the nearby I.G. Farbenindustrie complex, which was a stone's throw from our camp. Information was leaked out about the origin of the soap from inmates working in the gas chambers.

Oldest synagogue in the United States

Sid Cohen of Windsor mentions in a letter (CJN, Nov. 13) that sources differ as to whether the oldest synagogue in the United States is the Touro of Newport, R.I., or the Shearith Israel of New York City. The fact is, the Shearith Israel is the oldest congregation, having been founded in 1654, while Touro is second, founded in 1658. However, the actual edifice used by the Touro, constructed in 1763, is indeed the older building.

Shearith Israel is in its fifth building, which is newer than the Touro building. From 1658 when Touro was founded, until 1763, when the present structure was built, the Touro congregants prayed in private homes.

Perspectives

A look back, after 200 years, at Heinrich Heine

By BARUCH COHEN

Opinions about Heinrich Heine's significance have varied greatly. He has been regarded by some as a Jewish nationalist and by others as a non-Jewish Jew.

The classical historian of the Jews, Heinrich Graetz, portrays Heine, one of the greatest lyric poets in the German language, as a Jew who remained faithful to his people.

Critics of Judaism have often cited passages from Heine's writings to prove that the influence of Jews is harmful to modern civilization. Many Jewish critics have written that Heine was an apostate who had nothing in common with Judaism and who presented only false concepts of Jewish character.

There were still others who claimed him for the Jewish Reform movement. And some converted Jews or atheists of Jewish origin invoked Heine as their model.

Dec. 13, 1797, is generally accepted as the date of Heine's birth. There is no birth certificate or other explicit documentation, but the evidence recoverable from Heine's youth all indicates a date in 1797 or early 1798.

Heine's Jewish name was Chaim (after his deceased paternal grandfather), or Herz in German, but even as a small child he went by the name Harry, which he changed to Heinrich at his baptism in 1825.

He was the eldest of four children. He had two brothers, Gustav and Maximilian, and a sister, Charlotte. Heine's father was one of six brothers, all businessmen.

Heine entered the University of Bonn in 1819. On Oct. 18, 1819, he took part in a torchlight parade to celebrate the anniversary of the Battle of Leipzig. This kind of gathering had been banned the month before by the Carlsbad Decrees. Consequently, the demonstration was investigated by the academic court of the university, which interrogated Heine on Nov. 26. The incident may well be taken as evidence of his early devotion to the cause of liberty, which was characteristic of the contemporary German student.

Heine had been sent to the university to study law, and he did register for courses in Roman and German legal history. His real interest was in history and literature. He was introduced to Romantic literary theory, which he absorbed while altering some elements, shifting their orientation from the past to a progressive and future-oriented view of the poetic imagination.

It is not certainly known when Heine began to write poetry. His first published poems of 1817 appeared, oddly, in an anti-Semitic journal, Hamburg's Wächter (Hamburg's Watchman) under a pseudonym. Heine was placed in literary history as belonging to the school of Romanticism and he liked to present himself as the last Romantic, at once Romanticism's harvester and gravedigger. Late in life he wrote: "With me the old lyrical school of the Germans came to an end, while at the same time I opened the new school, the modern German lyric."

However, young Heine was not content to remain within the lyric mode. Early on, he began to experiment with both prose and drama, an indication that his sense of vocation as a writer was growing. His first essay, written in the summer of 1820, is, appropriately enough, entitled Romanticism. He also wrote critiques of literary works and drama.

In the summer of 1822, Heine became interested in a group of Jewish intellectuals in Berlin that called itself the Verein für Cultur und Wissenschaft des Judentum (Society for Culture and Science of the Jews). There he met the society's luminaries, such as Edouard Gans, Leopold Zunz and Isaak Markus Jost, who applied the ideas of the Enlightenment, the Reform movement and modern philological scholarship to traditional Judaism.

The society's concern was to overcome the isolation of Jewry from European culture by encouraging Jews to pursue avenues other than commercial careers, and to seek a resolution, through religious modernization, of the dilemma of integration and maintaining Jewish identity. The roots of the Verein lay in the late 18th-century impact of Enlightenment culture on German-Jewish intellect.

Heine's experiment with the society rather resembles what a contemporary North American Jewish student would call "finding himself." He did not fit well among these "Reform" Jews. His attitude toward Reform was exceedingly hostile. He saw Reform as an accommodation to the materialistic values of the dominant society. Heine was never an advocate for the Jewish religion, yet he was always an enthusiastic fighter for Jewish rights and civil equality.

From his relations with the society emerged the fragmentary novel The Rabbi of Bacherach (1840), which he began in early summer 1824. He did not finish the Rabbi of Bacherach, just as he did not finish three other attempts to write a novel. This failure has been the object of much speculation, one theory being that his difficulty lay in his lack of Jewish commitment and knowledge of Jewish historical and cultural color.

However, the Rabbi of Bacherach reflects Heine's genuine sympathy for the suffering in the Jewish past. While there is some fine writing in the first chapter of the fragment, the novel was a failure, and it reflects Heine's failure to define an integrated Jewish identity for himself.

Heine's works and letters depict the full spectrum of social and religious types of his day, ranging from pious rabbis to atheistic revolutionaries, from fighters for the honor of Jehovah to devotees of Christ or of Buddha, from peddlers to parliamentarians, from beggars to bankers, from journalistic scribblers to poets. We find his pages crowded with doctors, lawyers, actors, sugar brokers, army contractors, entrepreneurs, wine-merchants and dealers of old clothes. These figures are viewed against the background of contemporary gentile society and also against that of Jewish figures from the past, ranging from the patriarchs of the Bible to Spinoza and Moses Mendelsohn.

Heine never lived in a ghetto. He spent his early years in a Jewish family atmosphere, where he came into contact with Jewish ceremonies and received the basic rudiments of a Jewish education. The main thrust of his education, however, was secular German. In school, he was occasionally reminded of his Jewishness by the rough jokes of other boys, but he came to feel that Jewishness made up only one small part of his complex identity.

He strove to rid himself of this in various ways: by ostentatiously showing himself unfit for the kind of mercantile or banking career in which so many Jews, including his own family, had been signally successful, and by adopting a flamboyantly German personality in his early poems. Eventually, he took instruction from a Lutheran pastor and allowed himself to be baptized as a Protestant.

For a time, Heine proclaimed his mission as fighting for the political and social emancipation of Germany and of all mankind. He was part of a movement which set out to mediate between the scientific-Hegelian spirit of intellectual Germany and the traditions of Judaism, a mediation that included the systematic study of Jewish history, folklore and literature.

A visit to Poland confirmed Heine in his respect for Orthodox Judaism, though he himself opted for assimilation and a western European style of living.

The Sabbath, the Passover ritual, Jewish cookery were all attractive to Heine. The attraction of the Hebrew Testament, usually read in Luther's translation, and his recall of its Hebrew text, studied, in earliest youth, served as a remembrance in which the very look of the Hebrew letters played an important part.

To Heine, freedom did not mean only liberation from an unjust yoke. He believed that man is born free and can lose his freedom only by selling himself into bondage. In line with this idea, in all his writing Heine vents his anger, not only against tyrants, but also against those who put up with them. For Heine, the Jewish people, by achieving emancipation, had achieved a genuine freedom.

Historians who want to trace the development of Jew-hatred from primitive xenophobia and religious intolerance to modern racial anti-Semitism can find many supportive pages in Heine's works. Some of these, indeed, seem to anticipate the Holocaust of the present century.

With prophetic vision, Heine wrote in Religion and Philosophy in 1834 that a horror would burst out of the German romantic spirit: "Be Aware! The liberated Germany will present a more dangerous peril than the New Testament, the Croats and the hordes of the Cossacks," and "We Germans hate thoroughly, lastingly. Too honest, perhaps too unskillful, to revenge ourselves by speedy perfidy, we hate till our last breath."

In his last year, Heine once again speaks of himself as a Jew. "Only a poor Jew sick unto death," we find in his Confessions. "My ancestors belonged to the Jewish religion," he tells his readers, adding that he never thought this a matter of shame, but while continuing to castigate individual modern Jews who have made a "caricature" of Judaism, he firmly believed that the caricature would vanish one day, since the ethical core of Judaism was so strong.

In one way, of course, he does move closer to Judaism: he does posit, in his final years in Paris the existence of a God who has many of the features of the biblical Jehovah. From his early days in Berlin to his last years in Paris, he believed that Jewish learning held an honorable place among the cultural movements of the nations. He studied its history and many of its literary titans, and always regarded them as significant. He considered them to be part of a high civilization capable of participating in European thought and literature.

At different times and in different degrees Heine became acquainted with the major artists of his time: Rossini, Berlioz, Liszt, Chopin, Mendelsohn, Bellini and Wagner; Goethe, Dumas, Victor Hugo, Musset, Hans Christian Andersen, Baron Rothschild, Karl Marx and Friedrich Engels. Shuman and Shubert wrote music based on Heine's poetry. Heine's medieval poem, Tannhäuser, provided the inspiration for an opera by Richard Wagner.

The poet Chaim Nachman Bialik said, "It is worth remembering Heinrich Heine the Jew," who was a courageous soldier in the war of liberation of the Jew. Heine's name should be included on the list of modern Jewish geniuses along with Spinoza, Marx, Freud and Einstein.

Max Nordau, in a famous speech at the first Zionist Congress in 1897, remembers the great prophets and teachers of Judaism, namely Hillel the Elder, Philo, Ibn Gabirol, Yehudah Halevi, Maimonides, Spinoza… and Heinrich Heine.

Theodor Herzl, in his Utopian novel Old-New Land, describes a Friday evening service of Kabbalat Shabbat, and cites Heine's translation of Lechah Dodi, Likrat Kallah: "How beautifully Heine had put it: 'Kom, Gelibter…(come my beloved…).' Yes, Heine was a true poet who sensed the romance of national destiny."

"I make no secret of my Judaism, to which I have never returned because I never left it," Heine declared in 1850.

Could Herzl and Nordau have believed that the Jewish state of which they dreamed would disregard Heine? In Israel, Heine's name is hardly mentioned. There is no street in Jerusalem named after him. Yet in a letter to his friend, Moses Moser, the poet writes: "'May my right hand wither, if I forget thee Jerushalayim.' These are the words of the Psalmist, more or less, and they are still mine."

Only very recently, the mayor of Jaffa-Tel Aviv, Shlomo Laaht, dared to name a small lane at the outskirts of Jaffa, not with Heine's name, but simply as "The Rabbi of Bacherach." Haifa's mayor was more daring; not long ago, he named a central street with Heine's name. And in December 1996, the Israeli newspaper Ha'aretz dedicated an entire literary supplement to Heine, by publishing 14 Israeli poets' translations of one of his poems, A Spruce is Standing Lonely:

A spruce is standing lonely in the north on a barren height.
He drowses; ice and snowflakes wrap him in a blanket of white.

He dreams about a palm tree in a distant, eastern land, that languishes lonely and silent upon the scorching sand.

(Translated by Max Knight, H. Heine. Selected Works, Vintage Books, New York: 1973).

I understand this short poem as a "Zion poem." Heine is dreaming about a land somewhere in the east, and about the Western Wall of the Second Temple. This, I believe could be the reason why 14 Israeli poets translated the short poem.

And so, finally, the great poet Chaim Nachman Bialik's call to the Jewish people – and (my addition) to Israelis – was realized: "Remember Heine."

Rachmjel's story

By Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

Rachmjel was 14 when the commotion in the camp started one morning. Soldiers were coming. It was the day of liberation. Weakened by hunger and brutality, he looked up and saw, for the first time in his life, a black man. Years later, reunited with that man, he recalled the wonder he felt at the sight of his first American soldier and his first black man.

Rachmjel was one of the over 1,100 Jewish orphans brought to Canada by the Canadian Jewish Congress from 1947 to 1949. This year marks the 50th anniversary of their arrival at the port of Halifax. On Nov. 16, Vancouver's Holocaust Centre opened the exhibit Open Hearts, Closed Doors, to tell the stories of some of those 1,123 children. The stories of some of the 47 children who came to Vancouver are told in their own words and pictures. As the exhibit travels to other cities across Canada, other stories will be added.

The opening was crowded – the orphans, now themselves grandparents, were surrounded by their families and a host of friends and community representatives. Sadly, most of their rescuers are no longer alive. Saul Hayes, who was the national Canadian Jewish Congress director, fought before, during and after the war to bring these children and thousands of other Jewish victims of the Nazis to Canada.

Vancouver's children, speaking at the opening of the exhibit, thanked the late Jean Rose, Bessie Diamond, Morris Saltzman, and others who had been tireless in finding them homes, looking after their needs and keeping in touch with them as they grew older, married and began families of their own.

You enter the exhibit and to your left are the letters written by the malignant F.C. Blair, who was responsible for keeping Canada's doors so tightly closed. But it is the faces of children that capture your attention.

Children from age three to late teens stand with signs with their names on them, pictures that were circulated in Europe after the war to find surviving family members; a picture taken by Rachmjel of children on a train; and one boy writing, "Where are our parents?" on the side of a car.

Then come pictures of the ships that brought the orphans to Halifax and pictures of their lives in Canada; pictures of weddings; pictures of young girls laughing as they stride down a street in Vancouver; pictures of boys at play on a soccer field or smiling shyly at the camera with their young girlfriends or wives on their arms; brothers and sisters who had escaped the firestorm and were together again; an anxious child's face in among other children in a classroom – all images that look back at the visitor.

There are also scrapbooks prepared by the survivors, with pictures they treasure and their own words describing their wartime experiences, their post-war experiences and their lives in Canada.

The children liberated from Buchenwald, among them the young Rachmjel, were taken to France, where new hardships awaited. "They called us les infants terribles," he says. "They said that we were without redeeming value and likely to end up in jail as criminals." No one understood what had happened to these children, who indeed vented their anger and hurt by trashing their rooms and refusing to behave the way young gentlemen were expected to behave.

Yet they, like the other children being discovered all over Europe, did have value. Canada, so closed to them as victims, gradually opened its doors. The story is well known to many. If you don't know it, then I recommend Open Your Hearts: the Story of the Jewish War Orphans in Canada, 1947-1949, by Vancouverite Fraidie Martz. She has interviewed dozens of people who were members of the Orphans Group. In her book, you will find their stories in their own words, as they moved from darkness to light.

Jewish families opened their doors and hearts, but for many of the orphans it was tough going.

"We were treated like lepers," writes one.

Another: "They still call us greeners."

But many others tell of families that persevered, even when they could not understand the anguish and anger of their young charges. At first stigmatized by their experiences, the children gradually became a part of communities across Canada.

Those communities can book this easily mounted exhibit for their own showing, and they can add their own stories to it. Contact Roberta Kramer, executive director of the Vancouver Holocaust Education Centre, at #50 - 950 W. 41st Ave., Vancouver, V5Z 2N7, or call her at 604-264-0499, Fax 604-264 - 0497, or e-mail her at [holedctr@direct.ca].

Rachmjel, now Robbie to most of us, should have the last word. He writes, "I think this is the greatest country in the world. I have had nothing but wonderful experiences since coming to Canada. The only time I heard insulting remarks towards Jewish people was recently from Doug Collins supporters at the human rights inquiry.

"I would ask young people to keep an open mind when they see newcomers to this country. Do not stop by looking at the surface of people. Experience the adventure of getting to know other kinds of people. Each one of us possesses wonderful qualities, regardless of our color or religion."

Trading English for Yiddish

By Shel Krakofsky in London

Shortly after the death of Princess Diana, Clive James, the respected writer and British television celebrity, advisor to Prince Charles and confidant to the late princess, wrote the following sentence in the New Yorker: "Of all the poisonous dreck ever written about Diana in the newspapers, the most despicable was based on the assumption that she was stupid."

The Globe and Mail also likes to indulge in Yiddish. Consider this subheadline last year: "Hollywood released 15-20 blockbusters over the past 16 weeks. For the most part they were dreck…"

Now I have no objection to this usurpation of this perfectly routine, if somewhat shmootzig Yiddish term, but in neither case is there the slightest acknowledgement that the word was ever given for the taking. Yet there it is, the d-word, completely naked without even the clothing of italics.

Dreck has become English. Or, as many composition teachers and literary critics will tell you, the reverse is even more true!

English speakers have appropriated Yiddish with the same gusto as they have adopted bagels. This wonderfully frank, earthy, descriptively minimalist, cozy and friendly language entered the mainstream the same way the immigrants did, through the garment trade, the shmatte business.

It was the shmatte business that gave baseball a term that was popular with broadcasters and writers in the era before shmattes became – you should pardon the expression – textiles. A player or team that came out of a slump was said to be "off the schneid." For example, "With that hit, Babe Ruth is finally off the schneid."

In the garment business, a schneider was a cloth cutter. When the garment bosses played each other gin rummy, they referred to a hapless player as a mere "schneider." When one of the bosses finally succeeded, he was said to be "off the schneid." (May the Blue Jays and Expos soon enter this graceful state!)

I.B. Singer used to say that Yiddish had no word for weapons and it is possibly the only language that has never been spoken by a people in power. Direct, unpretentious and sometimes mischievous, Yiddish is now part of the English language, if only in single words and phrases.

Is there a film festival where the tuxedoed and gowned don't shmooze? Or a conservatory to which the most upwardly mobile don't shlep their children for music lessons. Or a discipline of any kind that doesn't have its mavens?

Just think how short the unwieldy 886-page psychiatric bible (or heresy, depending on your point of view), the Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders (DSM) would be were it written in Yiddish. Currently in its fourth edition, the DSM includes more than 300 disorders classified as mental diseases. Critics say it also medicalizes too many behaviors that are merely personality variations and character flaws.

How about reducing the tome to the following entries: ABM – a bissel meshuge; M – meshuge; GM – gantz meshuge.

And there it is in three entries, the entire range of human behavior from quirky (ABM) to neurotic (M) to psychotic (GM).

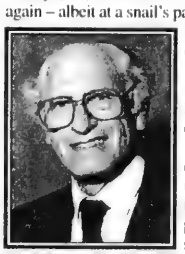
When Sigmund Freud wrote his trusted disciple Sandor Ferenczi about Freud's rival Carl Jung, he did not use clinical or elevated language. Freud simply wrote, "Jung is meshuge." No need to get bogged down with psychiatric lingo.

That Yiddish in its most basic forms is now generally understood is a happy and fortuitous development. If non-Yiddish speaking, English-educated people want to share some of the words, it's okey dokey by me. Though I think a trade is in order.

For the use of Yiddish, I want to give back some English words that have infested Jewish households. For starters, I will gladly return the word assimilation. I'm also willing to hand back two other vague, misunderstood and overused expressions – continuity and egalitarian.

Nu?

The voice of Arafat



By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

I am writing this column while the peace negotiations between the Palestinian Authority (PA) and Israel have resumed once again – albeit at a snail's pace. I cannot predict how these talks will end, or whether by the time you read this article they will have produced success or failure.

I have been careful not to add unnecessary fuel to the flames of passion that have surrounded this problem, but since I am writing this on the anniversary of the murder of Yitzhak Rabin, I feel that I must give the reportage something of a balance.

It is no secret that I have not been the greatest admirer of Israel's prime minister, whose meandering policies have had a share in more crises than Israel should have to endure.

On the other hand, I do not belong to those who mindlessly condemn everything he has done and have even gone so far as to assign much of Israel's precarious international position to him personally – thereby exonerating the PA from all complicity. It would be wrong to conceal the fact that Yasser Arafat and his cohorts have done very little to help the peace process in a constructive fashion – not only by their actions but also by the words that underlie them.

It is no accident that the Palestinian Covenant has not been amended, despite the obligation that Arafat took upon himself to do this. The covenant continues to aim at the destruction of Israel and on that basis, a peaceful partnership is hard to produce.

Palestinian anti-Judaism is rabid and it goes far beyond the political conflict between Arabs and Israel. The official newspaper the Authority has this to write: "There is no difference between Hitler and Ben-Gurion, and if there was a difference at all, it was one of quantity and not of substance. Anyone who investigates the crimes of the Zionists discovers explicitly the complementary traits between Zionism, which is a racist-terrorist movement, and the Nazi movement."

Another aspect of such sentiments is the emphasis that the Holocaust was "a profitable investment" for Jews.

"The Jews claim there were six million killed, but precise scientific research established that there were no more than 400,000. The Jews have profited materially, spiritually, politically and economically from the talk about the Nazi killings. This investment is favorable to them and they view it as a profitable activity; so they inflate the number of victims all the time. As you know, when it comes to economics and investments, the Jews have been very experienced ever since the days of the Merchant of Venice."

From time to time, Arafat himself indulges in talk of this kind. Of course it appears in Arabic only and is rarely translated, but when it is, he claims that he spoke only for internal consumption.

I can imagine what would happen if Netanyahu spoke of Arabs in these terms and what kind of ruckus would ensue. Fortunately he does not do this – to speak in these terms has not been, and I hope never will be, our style. Peace of any kind is not obtainable unless both parties abstain from demonizing each other. It is time to stop not only terrorist actions but terrorist words as well.

The Kirshner File

The passing parade

By Sheldon Kirshner

They died recently, leaving footprints in time...

Jerome Lemelson, a prolific inventor, held more patents than any other American since Thomas Edison. An industrial engineer, Lemelson invented high-tech mechanisms used in cordless phones, fax machines, industrial robots, videocassette recorders, bar scanners and automatic warehouses. He applied for his first of about 500 patents in 1954, when he was 31.

Yuli Khariton, a physicist, supervised the building of the Soviet Union's first atomic bomb in 1949. Born in St. Petersburg, he was a member of the Soviet Academy of Sciences and director of the country's pre-eminent nuclear research facility.

Leon Edel, a specialist in American literature, wrote a five-volume ground-breaking biography of Henry James. A McGill University graduate, as well as a former professor of English at Sir George Williams University (Concordia), he also produced biographies on Willa Cather and Henry David Thoreau, and edited the papers of Edmund Wilson.

Yevgeny Khaldei, a photographer, took one of the most famous pictures of World War II. In 1945, when the Red Army stormed into Berlin, he snapped an indelible photograph of a soldier hoisting the Soviet flag over the Reichstag. During the Soviet era, Khaldei, a victim of anti-Semitism, was not given credit for this piercing photograph.

Lev Kopelev was a Soviet human rights activist, dissident and scholar. Charged with anti-state activities, he endured the degradation of a gulag for 10 years. Booted out of the Soviet Writers' Union, then stripped of his citizenship, he immigrated to Germany in 1980. He was a close friend of Andrei Sakharov.

Chone Shmeruk was one of the world's leading authorities on Yiddish. A Polish Jew, he taught at the Hebrew University, and was an editor of The Penguin Book of Modern Yiddish Verse and author of Chapters in Yiddish Literature.

Georg Solti conducted the Chicago Symphony Orchestra and the London Philharmonic and directed the Royal Opera at Covent Garden. During his career, he won more Grammy Awards than anyone else. His interpretation of Brahms, Beethoven, Bartok, Mahler, Verdi and Wagner are considered classics.

Sir Joshua Hassan, scion of a Sephardi family, was the first mayor of the British colony of Gibraltar and then its chief minister.

Baron Edmond de Rothschild was reportedly the wealthiest member of the legendary banking family. A French citizen, he presided over the fortunes of Banque Prive, based in Geneva. Like his grandfather, Edmond, he was a generous benefactor of Israel and Jewish causes.

Sydney Newman, the son of Russian immigrants who settled in Toronto, was an influential producer at the National Film Board of Canada and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation before being appointed chief of drama at the British Broadcasting Corporation.

Robert Lewis, a founder of the Actors Studio in New York, was one of the most celebrated acting teachers in the United States. His pupils included Marlon Brando, Meryl Streep and Montgomery Clift. He also directed Broadway plays, notably Brigadoon and The Teahouse of the August Moon.

Murray Burnett, a high school English teacher, wrote Everybody Comes to Rick's, the play upon which the 1943 Oscar-winning Hollywood film, Casablanca, starring Humphrey Bogart and Ingrid Bergman, was based.

Saul Chaplin, a songwriter who composed Please Be Kind, won three Academy Awards for scoring the musicals An American in Paris, Seven Brides for Seven Brothers and West Side Story.

Sir Rudolf Bing, general manager of New York's Metropolitan Opera from 1950 to 1972, established the Met as one of the world's most prominent stage companies. By hiring African-America divas Leontyne Price and Marion Anderson, he broke the color barrier once and for all.

Leo Jaffee, for decades a Columbia Pictures executive, produced classics like Lawrence of Arabia, On the Waterfront, Porgy and Bess, A Man for all Seasons and Guess Who's Coming to Dinner.

Max Youngstein, as head of United Artists' production department, greenlighted the beloved movies Marty and Around the World in 80 Days.

Oscar Lewenstein, a key figure in the British movie industry, produced A Taste of Honey, Tom Jones, Saturday Night and Sunday Morning and The Entertainer.

Shirley Clarke (Brimberg) won an Academy Award in 1962 for her documentary, Robert Frost: A Lover's Quarrel With the World. From 1975 to 1983, she was a professor of film at the University of California in Los Angeles.

Marvin Rothenberg, a failed Hollywood director, founded MPO Videotronics, the largest studio in the United States specializing in television ads. A liberal, he made a point of hiring actors whose careers had been destroyed during the McCarthy era.

Barry Gray (Bernard Yaroslaw) hosted the first talk radio show in North America, influencing a generation of imitators. He developed the concept in Miami in the 1940s and later refined it in New York.

Roy Lichtenstein was a pioneer of the Pop Art movement. Often inspired by comic books, he created powerful and subliminal paintings.

Stefan Lorant, the innovative editor of the Munich Illustrated Press from 1928 to 1933, turned photojournalism into a tour de force. Life, founded in 1936, was supposedly modeled on Lorant's magazine.

Judith Merril (Juliet Grossman) was a science fiction writer and editor of the first rank, the only woman associated with the Futurists, whose members included Isaac Asimov and Frederick Pohl.

Alfred Sheinwold, a bridge champion, was the author of Five Weeks to Winning Bridge, a classic of the genre, and for three decades a syndicated daily columnist for the Los Angeles Times.

Miguel Najdorf, a grandmaster of the chess board, was ranked as one of the world's top 10 players in the late 1940s. Born in Warsaw, he lived in Argentina from 1939 onward, winning the Argentine chess championship eight times.

Joan Daves, of Berlin and Manhattan, was a renowned literary agent. Her illustrious clients ran the gamut from Elias Canetti to Nelly Sachs, both of whom were Nobel Prize laureates.

Arthur Liman, a lawyer widely considered a master of cross-examination, was chief counsel to the U.S. Senate committee which investigated the Iran-contra affair in 1987.

Esther Gottesman, an American Jewish community activist, played an integral role in Israel's acquisition of the Dead Sea Scrolls.

Irving Strobing, a U.S. army radio operator from Brooklyn, stirred a nation when, in 1942, he tapped out a poignant telegram telling of the imminent fall of Corregidor to Japan.

Mina Rees, a mathematician, was the first female president of the American Association for the Advancement of Science.

Peter Blos, author of On Adolescence and The Adolescent Passage, was one of the first child psychoanalysts in the United States.

Pragmatism not part of Israeli agenda

By SIMON ROSENBLUM

Guest Voices

Yitzhak Rabin, during the final few years of his life, became very anxious about the possible emergence of an Iran/Iraq coordinated front against Israel, emboldened with ballistic missiles and non-conventional weapons.

In response, Rabin saw the imperative of creating an environment of peace between Israel and its immediate neighbors to head off this Doomsday Alliance. This, more than anything, drew Rabin towards the Oslo peace accords.

Now Oslo is in dire jeopardy. Without doubt, the Hamas terror and the unwillingness of Chairman Yasser Arafat and the Palestinian Authority (PA) to seriously and consistently confront Hamas has contributed mightily to the present impasse, and there cannot be any moral equivalency between Palestinian bombs and Israeli bulldozers.

The issue is how to get Arafat to do what is necessary and what the PA is capable of, without creating a popular Palestinian resentment that strengthens the hand of Hamas. In this regard, the most senior Israeli intelligence officials from both the IDF and the Mossad presented a joint report to Netanyahu and his cabinet saying that upgraded Israeli adherence to the provisions of the Oslo accord would most likely inspire greater security cooperation between Israel and the PA. One hand would wash the other. Benjamin Netanyahu and his cabinet refused to accept the report!

Instead, as the Israeli newspaper Ma'ariv put it in a Nov. 3 editorial, we get the "three no's" of the Netanyahu government: "No" to a Palestinian state, "No" to a retreat on settlements and "No" to any compromise on Jerusalem. The result is simply no chance for the peace process.

Foreign Minister David Levy is sent to Washington to negotiate with at least one hand tied behind his back. If the Netanyahu government is unwilling to, at a bare minimum, keep the peace process alive by taking what U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright has called "small steps" (ie: in response to credible security cooperation with the PA, Israel would take a "time-out" from settlement expansion and proceed with meaningful IDF redeployment in the West Bank), then renewed violence is almost a certainty.

Different agenda

Netanyahu, however, has a very different agenda. He wants to skip such interim measures and proceed directly with final status talks. The only problem being that his idea on final status are understood by moderate Israelis to be insulting and dangerous. Netanyahu fiercely clings to the position that at best, the Palestinians will recover 50 percent of the West Bank, and that whatever this Palestinian entity would be called, it would be broken up by Israeli settlements running throughout.

About two-thirds of Israelis, on the other hand, understand that approximately 90 percent of the West Bank will have to be returned to the Palestinians, and that Palestinians living in Arab east Jerusalem will need to have some form of identity with the new Palestinian state. It has however, become totally transparent that Netanyahu's call for accelerated final status talks are a recipe for disaster. With his negotiating positions, final status talks would be lucky to last a day and all hell would break loose.

Keep in mind that all the intelligence organizations — whether it be the CIA, or Israeli ones — report that relations between Israel and the Palestinians are likely to degenerate into serious violence if intermediate steps are not taken to calm things down. What would be so terrible, even for Netanyahu and his allies, to freeze settlement expansion? After all, there is a 12 percent vacancy rate in Israeli West Bank settlements, which is more than enough to accommodate natural population growth for several years. Even Har Choma could proceed if it was turned into a model joint Arab/Israeli housing project.

But no, such pragmatism is not seemingly on the Israeli government agenda. Netanyahu and Arafat will continue to bring out the worst in each other, and the peace process will become even more crisis ridden and faltering. An historic opportunity is being lost, and the coming period is likely to be very explosive. A time bomb is ticking, and renewed violence may even eventually lead to war. The best Netanyahu offers is to accuse his opposition for forgetting what it means to be a Jew! One doesn't know whether to laugh or cry.

The right questions

Rabbinic Reflections

By RABBI REUVEN TRADBURKS

Very rarely do we ask the question: Why are all these good things happening to me?

It is popular to ask, "What did I do to deserve this tragedy?" We assume that since we are good people, and G-d is a good G-d, then we should not be suffering with this illness, this loss or this tragedy. These are all good questions, even if the answers are elusive.

However, the other question is rarely asked. "Why are all these good things happening to little me? What did I do to deserve such success, such wonderful and healthy children, and to live in such an open and free society that I can live in peace?"

We never ask these questions because we are so arrogant that we assume that because we are righteous, we deserve everything we get. We deserve success, prosperity, health and peace.

From the prayers of Abraham and Jacob in this week's parshah, the Torah gives us a different perspective. Abraham pleads on behalf of the people of Sodom in his famous "if there are 50 righteous people" argument. However, he introduces his representation to G-d with a powerful statement of humility – "I am dust and ash." Abraham, the father of the Jewish people, describes himself as dust and ash!

Jacob, in this week's parshah is nervous about his encounter with Esau, who wants to kill him. Jacob pleads with HaShem for protection. His introduction is: "I am undeserving of all the kindness you have shown me." (Genesis 32:11) Jacob, who will become the father of the 12 tribes of Israel, calls himself undeserving of all the kindness he has received. He pleads for protection, even if he is undeserving of this protection.

Moses, later in the Torah, is described as the humblest of all people. The leader of the Jewish people, the one who prevailed over Pharaoh, saved the people from Egypt, led them through the desert – he is the humblest of all people.

We see from the Torah that the posture we need to assume in prayer and in life is not one of smugness. We cannot think that all our success has come because we deserve it. Rather, humility is the recurring theme of the Jewish greats.

We need to more often ask the question, "What did I do to deserve all these wonderful things?"

Holocaust stories testimony to hope

The Light After The Dark* by Alvin Abram (Abbyfield Publisher, $27.95).

The six stories from the Holocaust in this volume are unusual and engrossing. Like many others of a similar nature they contain much that is appalling and evil, a degradation of the spirit. But they are also a testimony to human fortitude, hope, courage and inspiration. Out of darkness came forth light and out of despair flowed renewal and redemption.

An Eye for an Eye concerns Zalman Katz, who never forgot the betrayal of his brothers by two White Russian farmers and a local police chief. After gruelling years as a partisan fighter and Russian soldier, he discovers and kills the callous betrayers. In a bizarre, surprise ending to the memoir, the brutal police chief, after receiving an unexpected telegram, puts a bullet through his head.

Before Michael Kutz's mother is murdered by the Nazis, she implores him to fulfil two promises: never to forget that he is a Jew, and if he survives the war, to visit Palestine.

In The Promise, we learn that many years later Kutz becomes a tireless worker in Montreal for Jewish causes. Finally, in 1990, he visits Israel, makes his way to the Western Wall and at 59, celebrates the bar mitzvah that the war had denied him: "When the reading was over, everyone formed a circle and danced. Men from all over the grounds ran to join the celebration. Chassidim, tourists and soldiers held hands, raised their combined voices in spontaneous joy, singing Hebrew songs around a crying Michael Kutz."

Dubi Arie, now of North York, emigrated to Israel and fought in the Six Day and Yom Kippur wars. In I Have A Mission, Dubi, spiritually transformed at the triumphant sound of the shofar at the conquered Western Wall, vowed that he would create a monumental work of art that would instil in every Jew the sense of awe and pride that he felt at that moment.

His brilliantly painted, seven-paneled, work in oils is reproduced in full color in the book. It illuminates 4,000 years of Jewish history, from Abraham to the creation of Israel. It measures close to 40 feet by 7 feet and is replete with imagery and symbolism. Dubi now lives and works in North York as a successful artist, his mission fulfilled.

The remaining stories by Moshe Perlmutter, Marjan Rosenberg, Faigie Libman and Batia Malamud – now all Canadians – are, like the others, convincing narratives of survival and victories of the human spirit over iniquity.

Alvin Abram has fashioned a book to be cherished. It both nourishes and enlarges the spirit.

Tzedakah: a habit best developed when young

Today, we continue our look at tzedakah and the World Wide Web.

Tzedakah, of course, is a habit best developed when young. I was struck by the many sites on the Internet geared toward developing a sense of community and commitment among young people.

In Tzedakah and Community: Living Jewish Day to Day, there are many suggestions for nurturing that sense of responsibility both inside and outside the home [http://www.bnaibrith.org/cjihomepag/fifweb/jewish.html]. Some tips: Set the table for Sabbath dinner...Put money in the pushke...Visit the elderly at Chanukah. The site quotes Rabbi Eliyahu Dressler: "Parents are obligated to help their children convert their self-centered orientation into an altruistic one – that is, to learn to love their fellow as themselves...The first step in this learning process is acquired naturally in the family, when parents accustom their children to do things for them and for each other."

You can find more children's tzedakah projects at [http://jcn18.com/newstand/jptoday/hhbar03.htm] and [http://www.bnaibrith.org/cjihomepag/fifweb/famtime.html].

Many schools encourage their pupils to bring in tzedakah money and deposit it in a pushke. Congregation Shir Hadash in Los Gatos, California goes one step further [http://www.uahc.org/congs/ca/ca006/notes9706/educ01.html]. The students established their own "tzedakah council" and studied several worthwhile projects around the world. They decided to support "Jewish solidarity, the Cuban Jewish Relief Fund and AIDS research" and at a later point decide on the next tzedakah projects. The kids' Greenburgh Hebrew Centre Religious School in Dobbs Ferry, N.Y. runs their own Tzedakah Fair [http://uscj.org/metny/dobbsghc/rlschool/tf.html].

I also recommend Virtual Jerusalem's Tzedakah: Why Should we Give? [http://www.virtual.co.il/city_services/holidays/rosh/whygive.htm] "Did you know that the root of the Hebrew word 'give' is 'natan' – [the letters] nun, taf, nun? Notice that you can read it backwards and forwards. What does that tell us? That through giving,you get back." There are also links to a couple of stories about tzedakah, a rendition of the Shlock Rock song Give a Tenth and instructions about how to build you own tzedakah box.

Another lovely project is described in B'nai Mitzvah Tzedakah: "Twin" with Disabled Israelis [http://www.jewish.com/bk950825/suptwin.htm]. Bar and bat mitzvah-aged children outside Israel are paired with Israeli children, many of whom were born blind and have multiple disabilities.

And then there is the story of Oakland's Robert Schiff [http://www.jewish.com/bk950825/suplieu.htm] who asked his bar mitzvah guests to donate their bar mitzvah gifts to tzedakah in lieu of gifts.

"I'm not saying it's the thing for everyone but it was the right thing for me."

It also seemed like the right thing for a couple of adults celebrating another simchah. Sandra and Andrew Cohen were married in January 1996 in Gainesville, Fla. As part of their wedding gift, they encouraged their friends to donate to tzedakah in their name. They also set aside a portion of their gifts for the charities listed at [http://gnv.fdt.net/~sandrew/tzedakah.html].

I'd like to finish my look at tzedakah and the World Wide Web by quoting the most famous Jewish thought on the subject – Moses Maimonides' Eight Levels of Giving [http://www.virtual.co.il/city_services/holidays/rosh/eight.htm]. The great 12th century rabbi/philosopher described a range of tzedakah from (8) – giving grudgingly, to (5) – giving before one is asked to give, to the highest, (1) – a gift, a loan, a business partnership or a job that renders alms unnecessary.

So to anyone who is pulling out a chequebook or has resolved to do more volunteer work or is about to hire someone in need, yasher koach to you!

New BBYO home proving popular with members

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

THORNHILL — Word is getting out that B'nai Brith Youth Organization (BBYO) has moved from its small office in the Bathurst Jewish Centre (BJC) to a new home in York Region.

The spacious second-floor location it shares with UJA Federation's satellite office at 1118 Centre St. is becoming a popular venue for BBYO members to hold programs and chapter meetings, and just to hang out, according to Stephanie Hofland, director of BBYO's 15-chapter Greater Toronto Area (GTA) Council, which includes Hamilton and Kitchener.

BBYO programs typically include community service, social, educational, Judaic and athletic events. The annual Beauheart ball was scheduled for this past weekend at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, and a winter convention is set for early February. New programs are in the works to take advantage of the new facilities.

The new 2,000-square-foot location, opened this summer, includes offices, small meeting rooms, a boardroom and a program room with a computer. Downstairs on the main floor is a lounge that can comfortably hold 75 people. Couches and a new television have been donated to BBYO for the room.

"We share everything with UJA Federation, but BBYO tends to use everything much more," said Hofland.

"It's a good partnership," said Ilan Meister, UJA Federation's York Region coordinator. "Just having their kids walk in and out of the office is good for me. We've had a couple of their kids get involved in our programs, and maybe it will happen vice versa as well."

His office serves an estimated 44,000 Jews, including about 75 percent of BBYO's Toronto-area members. GTA membership has grown by 13 percent over last year, from 312 members to 360.

"The office is so much nicer and bigger. People come for their chapter meetings or programs, and stay and chat," said Sherri Rotstein, 17, n'siah (president) of B'nai Brith Girls, GTA Council and a Grade 12 student at William Lyon Mackenzie Collegiate Institute.

"It's more accessible for a lot of people. There is a growing population of BBYO members at my school [Vaughan Secondary School]," said Avery Benmergui, 18, GTA council gadol. He is Rotstein's counterpart for Aleph Zadik Aleph, BBYO's boys' division.

Benmergui joined the organization almost five years ago to meet new people. He enjoyed the fraternal aspect and "took a real interest" in BBYO once he started learning more about it.

For Hofland, the leadership training aspect appears to be important for many members. "They start to learn how to be a leader. They take on challenges, and it excites them to be able to function in an independent, adult-like way. They start to learn it's not so scary to make a phone call, plan a program or get a guest speaker in."

Access to the new premises provides members with "a cozy feeling of being a part of something," said Hofland. The rooms are being "booked solid" for meetings, she added.

Sharing the space with UJA Federation is strengthening BBYO's link with the umbrella organization, Hofland believes.

"We've always been supported by UJA Federation," she said. "We do get a grant from them, but I think our affiliation is getting stronger with Ilan in the office. If he needs help, I'm down the hall. I'm kept informed of what's going on, and the teens are getting the cream of the crop of opportunities.

"We definitely have improved our space enormously."

Jewish showbiz honchos swap 'war' stories

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Three top executives in the entertainment industry told war stories from the trenches of showbiz at a recent panel discussion on the business of entertainment.

The program, which featured Garth Drabinsky, chair and CEO of Livent; Robert Lantos, chair and CEO of Alliance Communications; and Gerry Schwartz, president, chair and CEO of Onex Corporation, drew a full house at the Leah Posluns Theatre.

Introduced as a "one man industry," Drabinsky, an entertainment lawyer and former movie producer and exhibitor, switched to live entertainment following his much-publicized split with the Cineplex Odeon Corporation in 1989.

Today the producer and exhibitor of such musical blockbusters as Phantom of the Opera, Show Boat, Ragtime and Sunset Boulevard runs six theatres in North America.

Drabinsky told the audience he finds working in live entertainment "is giving me the thrill of my life."

It's also been financially rewarding. He said his company garnered 20 percent of live theatre box office sales in the United States last year.

He noted that shows based on adaptations of books tend to be the most successful. "It's fundamental to have an underlying work."

And while he invests in the development of Canadian dramatic material, he made no apologies for mounting major productions based on American rather than Canadian works. The former have more universal appeal, he said.

"The Canadian public is interested in American theatre subject matter."

Unlike Drabinsky, Lantos, has been a promoter of Canadian cinema and Canadian talent since he began producing films in the mid-'70s.

When offered, he declined the opportunity to work in Hollywood following the successful box office run of his 1976 film In Praise of Older Women, he said. "It felt like a cliché to go [to Hollywood] at the first opportunity.

"I cherished the freedom I had and did not want to be a prisoner to a particular system. I thought I could succeed in a more challenging way at home, creating a talent pool. It took a lot of years and setbacks to build the foundation of the industry here."

Canadians have an "inferiority complex," he said, and it is "perpetuated" by the media. "That security complex continues to haunt this country. You have to prove that you're worthy."

In the 1985, Lantos co-founded Alliance Communications, a multifaceted company involved in film and television production, distribution and releasing. Alliance, now a public company, is Canada's largest independent production company.

However, in the early years Lantos had difficulty borrowing money from the banks, which did not understand the "concept of intellectual property," he said.

One of the first people to take an equity position in Alliance was Drabinsky, who invested in the company when he ran Cineplex, Lantos said. "It was a key moment in the history of Alliance. This is an opportunity to say thank you."

He also paid tribute to Schwartz, who is a member of the Alliance board of directors. Head of Onyx, a company with diverse interests which include catering and sugar as well as film production, Schwartz is a late bloomer when it comes to the film industry.

Three years ago, he co-founded Phoenix Pictures, a small Hollywood studio that produces A-Class films, among them, The Mirror Has Two Faces with Barbra Streisand and The People vs. Larry Flint, starring Woody Harrelson.

He said he learned a lot about movies when he visited the set of The Mirror has Two Faces. It took all day to film a 12-second scene, because Streisand didn't like the way her hair looked. As he watched the process unfold, all he could see was money flowing down the drain, he said. "This isn't a business like any other."

But Schwartz argues that the principles of common sense should apply to the movie business. People hide behind "the cloak of creativity to avoid discipline," he said. "Movie-making is just another business."

And while it is easy to raise money for Hollywood pictures, Schwartz predicted that some major studios that are carrying huge debt loads may soon go bankrupt, because the cost of making and promoting movies is escalating so rapidly.

In two years, the average cost of movie production and the promotion and advertising costs have each risen by $11 million he said. "There is nothing to show for this $22 million."

It cost $250 million to make the new Titanic movie and an additional $50 million to promote it, he said. To recover its cost, "it will have to be the third most successful film of all times."

Moderated by Pyllis Yaffe, president and CEO of Showcase Television, the evening was organized by the UJA's Arts and Entertainment and Marketing divisions and its Young Business Network.

Geldzaeler marks 100th birthday

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — It was most fitting that Hortense Cohen Geldzaeler was serenaded with Broadway melodies at a recent celebration at Forest Hill Place in honor of her 100th birthday.

Impeccably dressed and coiffed – her red lipstick matched perfectly manicured nails – Geldzaeler sang along with the entertainers, enjoying the music and the attention lavished on her by some 200 well-wishers.

Geldzaeler, a Forest Hill Place resident since 1992, is no stranger to the spotlight. She spent her early years on stage as a vaudeville performer in New York City, where she was born.

She was a child prodigy whose stage career began in 1905 when she started travelling the vaudeville circuit as a member of Gus Edward's Talented Kids.

Continuing to perform as a young adult, she was also hired by Charles K. Harris Music Publisher in New York's Tin Pan Alley, the hub of the American music industry in the early decades of this century.

Geldzaeler, a professional pianist and singer, played and sang the music of such legendary composers as George Gershwin and Irving Berlin from 1915 to 1918 while in the employ of Charles K. Harris.

Hortense Geldzaeler

"She had a rare talent," said her middle daughter Emily Grant. "She could play a song that she had heard, in any key, transposing the music immediately. When Irving Berlin had a song, Hortense would play it…She knew all the people in the music world."

In 1917, while touring with the American armed forces entertainment unit, she performed for the troops embarking for Europe in Amherst, N.S. There she met Canadian lieutenant Ben Geldzaeler of Toronto, whom she wed in 1920.

Married for 50 years, the couple had three daughters – Grant, Alfreda Henry and the late Phylis Weisfeld. Today there are seven grandchildren and seven great grandchildren.

According to Grant, her mother never regretted giving up her stage career to raise a family. "She said her first job was to be a good wife and mother. Her life was very full in Toronto."

She described her mother as a "unique" person who "played the piano, but she could cook too." She was a gracious hostess and on Sundays, the family would sing around the piano, entertaining the many guests who came to visit, Grant said.

At the birthday party, Rabbi Gunther Plaut spoke of his long acquaintance with Geldzaeler, who was active in the Holy Blossom Temple Sisterhood. She served in many executive positions including sisterhood president and was made a warden of the temple.

Henry, the oldest daughter, recalled her mother helping in the temple kitchen at sisterhood meetings. At the start of a meeting, she would take off her apron, run into the main room to play the piano ("She was the only one who could play God Save the Queen) and then she'd quickly return to the kitchen, put the apron back on and continue preparing refreshments.

When she thinks of her mother, Henry said, "it will always be the music. Our house was always full of music."

Everyone in the family was musical and the girls often sang in harmony with their mother at Holy Blossom programs and at other venues, she said.

Bnei Akiva school celebrates 25th anniversary

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Nearly 500 people jammed the banquet hall of Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue last week to mark the 25th anniversary of Yeshivat Or Chaim/Ulpanat Orot Girls School.

The dinner also honored Phil Schwartz, a founder and constant supporter of the school, the only Bnei Akiva religious Zionist school in the Diaspora.

Pictures in the lobby and in the souvenir journal encouraged reminiscences of the early days of the school, when the boys had classes at an old synagogue on Vaughan Road, and the girls had to take a special bus to a house deep in the countryside north of Bathurst and Highway 7.

Or Chaim is now on Almore near Wilmington and Ulpanat Orot is at Bathurst and Sheppard.

Saul Koschitzky, chairman of the board of directors, remembers being invited to Phil Schwartz's house on a Sunday afternoon to meet Nachman Sokol, Aron Frankel and "an American rabbi," to discuss "why Toronto needed a different kind of yeshivah that would teach Torah, Israel, secular studies and limudei kodesh (religious subjects).

Later in the evening, Henry Koschitzky, campaign co-chair said that during Or Chaim's struggling first year, Schwartz and Frankel came to him and asked for a companion school for girls.

"I said, we can hardly support [financially] the boys' school – what are you bringing up a girls' school for? So Phil and Aron promised to underwrite the deficit of a school for girls. And they did. And they still collected money for Or Chaim."

Joseph Edell, co-chair of the dinner together with David Koschitzky, praised the school for providing "an excellent education, a love of learning, and a sense of closeness to the land of Israel. Such schools strengthen a community," he said.

Rabbi Moshe Yeres, rosh yeshivah, summed up the effect of Or Chaim/Ulpana on its students by the story of a group of students on a recent Shabbaton in the country.

"They were roughhousing, playing Capture the Flag. But every time a boy lost his glasses in the snow, the playing stopped until the glasses were found.

"That sense of caring and sharing...and bonding is what the school wants to teach."

A "surprise speaker," as Edell put it, was Schwartz's grandson, Yonatan Glustein, age 11, who received enthusiastic applause when he described his grandfather as someone who was always willing and eager to learn something new, as a role model and as someone who taught the importance of living in the secular world as a committed Jew.

Speaking on behalf of Frankel, who has been associated with Schwartz both in business and in charitable work, Edell praised Schwartz for working on behalf of many educational institutions, such as Ner Israel, Bar-Ilan University, Eitz Chaim, and Kerem B'Yavnah.

Julia Koschitzky, who gave the main tribute to Schwartz, called him a "Jewish Renaissance man, who fully integrated his Jewish heritage with his secular life."

Greetings were also brought by Rabbi Yitzchok Kerzner, spiritual leader of Clanton Park synagogue, and by Schwartz's daughter Adrienne Green.

All the speakers also praised Schwartz's wife Faygie for supporting him in his philanthropic work.

Schwartz, responding to the greetings, said that Jews come from a tradition that admits that it doesn't have all the answers, "but we do know all the questions."

That, he said, is what "motivates us to build schools, to build a future that, if we do our part, G-d will do His."

Schwartz was presented with a plaque, and Faygie Schwartz received a framed picture of the couple surrounded by their 14 grandchildren.

The dinner also marked the establishment of the Phil and Faygie Schwartz Endowment Fund, which will be used to support Or Chaim and Ulpanat Orot.

Hamotzi was said by Dr. Norman Smith, general studies principal, and the benching was led by Rabbi Shlomo Brown, principal of Ulpanat Orot.

Dominion save-a-centre launches new store in Lawrence Plaza

The kosher scene in Toronto is exciting, partly because new kosher establishments are always opening up and appear to be staying.

This is the second in a series of three articles on what's new in kashrut in the Greater Toronto Area.

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It used to be Morgans Department Store. Then it was The Bay. Later it was Sport Mart. Now the building at the corner of Bathurst and Lawrence in the Lawrence Plaza has a new face — Dominion save-a-centre.

KASHRUT FRONT

But it's a save-a-centre with a difference. This one is designed to cater to the large number of kosher consumers in the area, with a large array of kosher products and services lining the outer walls of the store and filling both sides of an aisle. Not to mention assorted displays in other parts of the store.

Bill Sheine, vice-president of marketing for The Great Atlantic & Pacific Company of Canada, who own Dominion save-a-centre stores, accompanied The CJN on a tour of the facility, shortly before its opening on Dec. 7, and pointed out the kosher features.

There are four main kosher areas: specialties, baked goods, groceries, meat and fish.

There is a wide assortment of what Sheine called "kosher specialties," including pickles, spreads, and soups.

A display unit near the regular Baker's Oven shop carries baked goods from a number of sources, including Hermes, Richman's and My Zaidy's bakeries, as well as a full line of Entenmanns products.

Glatt kosher, prepackaged meats, under the supervision of K'Hal Adas Jeshurin (Breuers), will fill a 16-foot meat counter, along with fresh kosher poultry. Prepackaged fresh fish will also be available. A feature harkening back to the old days is the fish tanks that will hold live carp and trout.

"The tank will be beside its own preparation table, with its own chopping block and tools. You can choose your own fish and the staff will clean it for you," Sheine promised.

Another display case has frozen smoked fish and packaged fish products.

Other cases will hold kosher frozen products, ice cream and dessert foods, and kosher dairy products.

In the produce department (which Sheine noted with a grin he considers "the best selection of produce in town"), the customer will find prewrapped kosher candy, and seasonal displays, including wrapped gift baskets filled with kosher products.

There is an entire aisle devoted to kosher groceries. Also, many products sold under the store brands of Master Choice and Equality are under kosher supervision. Kosher store and national brands will be identified by blue stickers for the customers' convenience, Sheine said.

An innovative store feature is Meals in Minutes, which, besides a selection of easy to prepare foods (many of which will be kosher), offers an interactive meals machine, where you can get meal ideas and recipes.

Other features of Dominion save-a-centre are a floral shop that offers cut flowers, flower bouquets and potted plants. In the produce department, there is fresh squeezed orange juice, as well as 100 percent organic fruits and vegetables.

Sheine said, "We want this to be known as a community store," and he promised to work with community organizations whenever possible. The store accepts Zareinu dollars, for instance.

Community store

Store officials are anxious to heed the sensibilities of the kosher customer. When The CJN pointed out that a cart next to the kosher frozen fish case contained non-kosher sauces, the offending cart was immediately whisked away, and replaced by one with O-U supervised sardines.

The grand opening was hosted by Blue Jays broadcaster Jerry Howarth. Metro councillor Howard Moscoe cut the ribbon officially opening the new store.

The Lawrence Plaza Dominion save-a-centre will be open continuously from Monday at 8 a.m. until Saturday at 9 p.m., and Sundays from 9 until 6. The kosher counters and cases will be emptied and cleaned for Shabbat and holy days.

CAMPAIGN CALLS ON COMMUNITY

With one week left to go in its 1998 campaign, UJA Federation is making every last minute count.

Scores of volunteers began the final push for campaign support at a special telethon Sunday, which brought in thousands of additional dollars, boosting the campaign total to nearly $32 million – $4 million short of this year's goal. The telephone blitz continued during the evening all this week, as UJA Federation tried to make up for lost time caused by the postal strike.

Despite extensive arrangements for alternate payment methods, the mail stoppage delayed the majority of donations during the strike, threatening a successful campaign finish.

Sunday's telethon kicked off UJA Federation's Days of Decision, December 7 –17, during which community members who have not yet given a gift to the campaign are being urged to do so. In order to make as many calls as possible, campaigners will be trying to reach supporters from their homes and offices.

Days of Decision

Your Time To Make A Difference.

December 7th-17th, 1997

"Through the telethons, we have been stressing, one-on-one, the urgency of making payments," explained Campaign Chair Leo Goldhar. "Thousands of people who need our help could be affected if we can't successfully complete our campaign.'

"We're asking our volunteers to pull out all the stops and do whatever they can to get the last batch of donations in," said Judy Engel, who is co-chairing Days of Decision with Colin Lewis.

UJA Federation's 1998 campaign will officially close on December 17 with a celebration at the Sephardic Kehila Centre, 7026 Bathurst St. (north of Steeles).

Celebrated Canadian singer Amy Sky, who helped to launch Campaign 98 in August, will perform at the closing with her husband, recording artist Marc Jordan. CBC TV personality Ralph Benmergui will be the evening's Master of Ceremonies.

All contributors and volunteers are invited to both the event and the dessert reception that follows. Admission is $15 and attendance is by RSVP only. Please call Iris Lazarus at (416) 635-2883 ext. 177.

ISRAEL'S NEW CAMPAIGN

A new volunteer - driven campaign, in Israel, initiated by the Jewish Agency with seed funding from UJA Federations' across North America, is off to a fast start.

The fundraising drive is shifting into high gear after a decision two years ago to implement the project. According to Joe Dushansky, Director, Ruach Yisrael (The Spirit of Israel), "it is an incredible challenge to take something and mold it from the ground up."

What makes this initiative so unique is that Israeli citizens will be joining UJA Federations in a partnership that contributes to worldwide Jewish solidarity. Israelis, says Dushansky, are proud to be part of this effort and want it known that they are participating in the giving process.

"They feel it's time to do their part helping Jews right in their own backyard," says Dushansky. "There is a tremendous feeling that we can do things ourselves – it is time to get the ball rolling."

The campaign is off to an excellent start with a single donation of one million dollars slated to build "Schools of Excellence" – for underprivileged children and new immigrants. During the first stage of the campaign, all the money raised will stay within Israel, for projects related to education and the elderly.

Dushansky clearly believes Ruach Yisrael is for everyone in the country and the campaign's board of directors echoes the same sentiment. "We have board members from every walk of life – entertainers, academics and firefighters. This campaign belongs to the people of Israel, regardless of how much or little they give. This is a relationship of equals – we are all raising money for the same causes because we are all part of the Jewish culture."

The prospects for giving among union members seem especially good. "With more than 250,000 union workers contributing 10 shekels a month, it will start to provide a solution to the social problems we face. So far, there has not been one single refusal for a gift," Dushansky proclaims.

Dushansky is optimistic that Ruach Yisrael will foster a sense of world-wide Jewish cohesiveness and become one of the largest fundraising projects outside North America. "At the end of the day," he stressed, "unity is strength."

Ruach Yisrael will be directed toward building schools of excellence.

IN

UJA Federation is the leading force behind our community's Jewish education system and CHAT's (Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto) New Stream Program, is just one example of how the system strengthens the connection of students to their heritage.

A NEW OPPORTUNITY

Mark Sinyor, 17, currently in his fourth year at New Stream, funded by UJA Federation, believes "my eyes have been opened to Judaism in a way I never thought possible."

Although Mark attended a day school, he decided not to pursue a Jewish secondary school education, opting instead for a neighbourhood high school. Enrolled for only a year, Mark felt something was missing, and with some persistence from his father, researched the New Stream program. "My father wanted me to have the understanding and knowledge of Judaism that he was not exposed to," says Mark. "Plus, I had heard that the teachers at CHAT really challenge their students – this was something I was up for."

The Sinyor Family

BUILDING BLOCKS

For over 25 years, the New Stream program has been educating students who have little or no Jewish educational background. "The program was conceived as an outreach for those who want to further their understanding of their Jewish identity," says CHAT Headmaster Rabbi Marvin Pachino.

New Stream runs for four years with a focus on Hebrew and Rabbinics as well as general studies, such as science and languages. "People think that religion is a title. For me, it's tangible. CHAT has opened the doors to different perspectives of Jewish life," claims Mark.

STAYING POWER

The program's success is largely due to the students, because for many, the commitment to study Judaism on a higher level came from within. "New Stream has one of the highest retention rates of any parochial school program," notes General Studies Principal Sheldon Friedman. "We have students who continue their learning in Israel and some have become rabbis."

"There is no question I made the right decision to attend New Stream," says Mark. "Now, I must apply the tools that I've been given to live and grow in Jewish society."

The New Stream program, an important component of Toronto's Jewish education system, is another example of UJA Federation funding in action.

LEARNING AND LOBBYING IN OTTAWA

The recent Ottawa Fly-In, chaired by Irving Abella and Lorri Kushnir, marked the first-ever UJA Federation delegation to meet External Affairs Minister Lloyd Axworthy, Reform Party leader Preston Manning and Paul Vickery, Chief Prosecutor for the Canadian War Crimes Unit.

Vickery, who defended current government efforts against war criminals, said his department has taken action against 14 people since 1995. He announced that five cases would be brought to court in the next five months. According to Vickery, the unit is focused on proving Nazi war criminals failed to disclose their past upon immigrating to Canada, in order to revoke their citizenship and deport them. He also focused on the difficulty of obtaining clean, clear evidence to stand up in a criminal trial.

Kushnir, a lawyer, who expressed disappointment with what she heard, interpreted Vickery's remarks as "legalistic," in accordance with "the letter not the spirit of the law."

Highlights of the day included lunch with MPs and talks by pollster Dr. Conrad Winn, professional lobbyist Mark Resnick and Canada-Israel Committee Director Rob Ritter. Dr. George McDonald, president of the National Museum of Civilization reaffirmed his support for a Holocaust exhibit in the War Museum despite the opposition of veterans organizations.

During dinner, Israel's Ambassador to Canada David Sultan called his country's recent secret use of Canadian passports an "embarrassing incident." He also chastised Jerusalem Post publisher Norman Spector, a former Canadian Ambassador to Israel, for "misleading the Canadian public." Spector had suggested that Canadian intelligence officials may have cooperated with the Mossad in the affair.

Lloyd Axworthy

The mission impressed third year U of T student Noah Stoffman, who noted, "the day had an effect on the people we met and it had an effect on us."

"We were a potent, articulate, committed Jewish voice," said Irving Abella of the forty participants who spent a full 17 hours in the nation's capital.

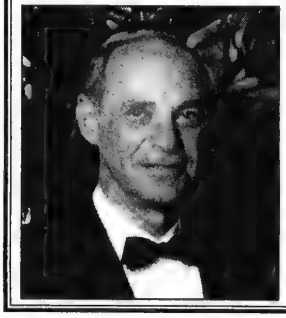
ALWAYS ON CALL

Before retiring, Herbert Sporn made a living by driving people around town in his own cab. Although his car meter is no longer running, the 70 year old grandfather is still navigating the city streets as a Senior Care volunteer driver.

Five years ago, Sporn began delivering Meals on Wheels to the elderly twice a week for Senior Care – a UJA Federation funded agency.

A FRIENDLY FACE

He also finds the time to drive seniors to doctors' appointments and other routine destinations – that is when he's not playing bridge, building model ships and attending meetings of his condominium's board of directors.



"I like to keep busy," says Sporn, "and what better way than to help people out."

But Sporn, whose father also volunteered as a Meals on Wheels driver, says sometimes it's about more than just a ride. "Human contact is often missing from the lives of many seniors and it means so much to them just to have company."

FEELING GOOD

Sporn says his volunteer work is also a way of giving something back to the community. "I feel good helping my fellow Jews and all it takes is a few hours of my time."

Senior Care recently acknowledged Sporn's dedication and commitment to community with an award for his involvement with the Volunteer Escort and Transportation Service Program.

Sporn says "maybe one day I'll be the one that needs a lift." Until then he'll be in the driver's seat.

If you would like to volunteer as a driver for Senior Care, please call Arnold Foss at (416) 635-2860.

SKATING SCHOLARSHIP

United Israel Appeal of Canada recently honoured immediate Past President Gerry Halbert by creating a scholarship fund to teach children living in Northern Israel to skate and play hockey at the Canada Centre in Metulla. Halbert is pictured above with two young Israeli skaters. Among those at the ceremony were Gerry's wife Tootsie, Murray and Marvelle Koffler, Harvey and Roz Wolfe, Julia and Henry Koschitzky, Shoel and Lil Silver and UIA Canada Executive Vice President Steve Ain.

Nelson and Ruth Reuben

Nearly 500 of UJA Federation's leading supporters recently gathered at the Four Seasons Hotel to celebrate the 1998 campaign. Radio personality Dennis Prager, one of America's most respected political and social commentators, was the guest speaker for the evening, sponsored by UJA Federation's Major Gifts and Atarah Divisions and the Royal Bank. The event was chaired by Barbara and Henry Bank and Lynn and Brent Belzberg. The following are some of the gala guests in attendance.

In Israel, land mines 'necessary': Sultan

The following is a speech delivered by David Sultan, Israel's ambassador to Canada, at last week's signing in Ottawa of the treaty banning the use, production and stockpiling of anti-personnel land mines.

Although Israel did not sign the treaty, it says it supports the humanitarian sentiments expressed in the document.

On behalf of the government of Israel and the Israeli delegation, let me congratulate the government of Canada for launching the "Ottawa Process" that has helped place the problems of indiscriminate and irresponsible use of anti-personnel land mines high on the international agenda. Let me also congratulate all the governments that joined the government of Canada in signing the anti-personnel mine ban convention.

Israel joins all those countries in supporting international efforts to resolve the problem of indiscriminate and irresponsible use of anti-personnel land mines which result in casualties, mostly of innocent and defenceless civilians, UN peacekeeping forces and humanitarian aid personnel.

Due to our unique situation in the Middle East involving an ongoing threat of hostilities as well as terrorist threats and actions along the borders, we are still obliged to maintain our ability to use anti-personnel land mines as necessary for self-defence in general and along the borders in particular.

Any such use is in accordance with the requirements of the Convention on the Use of Certain Conventional Weapons. Hence, at this juncture, Israel is regrettably unable to sign the convention until effective alternative measures are available to ensure the protection of civilians threatened on a daily basis by terrorists and to ensure the protection of Israeli forces operating in areas of armed conflict.

Our constraints notwithstanding, and in line with our support for the goals embedded in the convention, we have joined those states opposing the proliferation of anti-personnel land mines in issuing, in 1994, a unilateral moratorium prohibiting the export of anti-personnel land mines. That moratorium was extended in 1996 for three more years. Extending the moratorium indefinitely is being considered. In this context, it is worthwhile to note that Israel does not produce anti-personnel land mines and its export control restrictions enforce compliance with the moratorium.

To demonstrate our commitment to the international efforts not only in words, we have contributed financially as well as sending volunteers to the mine awareness program in Angola. Furthermore, Israel and Jordan have recently successfully carried out a combined project of clearing mine fields along our border. Currently, the governments of Canada and Israel are considering the establishment of a joint rehabilitation centre for land mine victims.

In conclusion, let me express my government's hope that the convention that has been opened for signatures, as well as additional international instruments negotiated in different forms that could be complemented by bilateral and trilateral initiatives, all these, will contribute to alleviating the problem caused by the indiscriminate and irresponsible use of anti-personnel land mines. Israel will be part of that global effort.

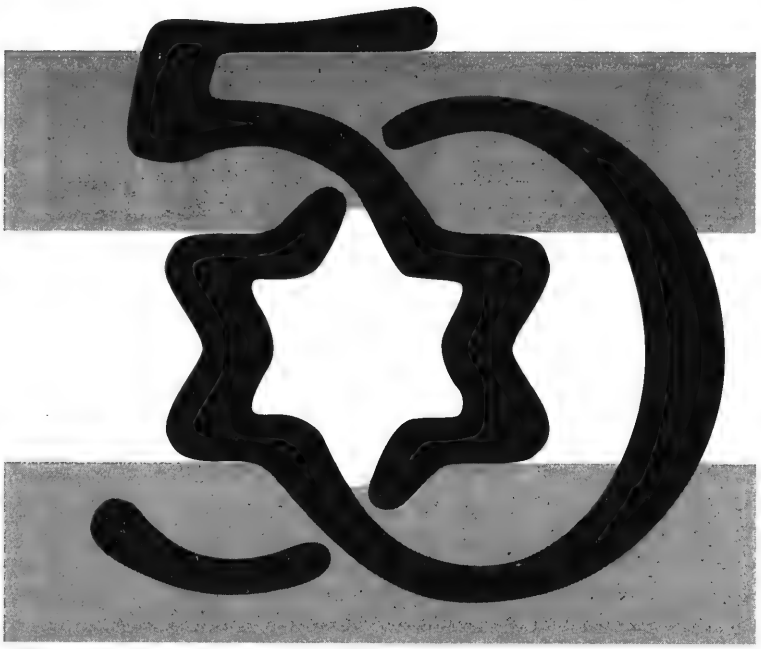
TORONTO CELEBRATES



יובל החמישים לישראל

ISRAEL AT 50

YOUR DATE WITH HISTORY

This month and all through 1998, we will be celebrating five amazing decades of hope, progress and success — and you're invited!
This is your guide to Toronto's celebration of Israel's 50th anniversary in 1998.
Learn about Israel's history and strengthen your association with our Jewish homeland.
Share in the memories and create new ones. Savour this historic opportunity.
Join with family, friends and neighbours to keep your date with history. Celebrate Israel at 50 with us!

This special supplement is sponsored by the Israel at 50 Committee — a consortium of nearly 150 community organizations under the auspices of the Consulate General of Israel and UJA Federation.

Unity and Pride on Independence Day

It's going to be a spectacular Yom Ha'atzmaut in 1998 on Israel's 50th birthday, April 30 — a day to melt the geographical distance between Toronto and Israel.

The largest Jewish community turnout ever is expected for a local celebration unlike any other. Up to 10,000 people will fill Toronto's National Trade Centre and Coliseum where entertainment for the entire family will be certain to stir hearts.

The Toronto celebration will feature a live link – via satellite – to Israel's gala anniversary event, so Toronto participants can share the historic moments with their Israeli counterparts.

Co-chairs Marvelle and Murray Koffler invite every member of the community to take part in what they call "a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity."

"An anniversary like this comes only once," says Marvelle. "Everyone will have a wonderful time — but it will be much more than a fabulous party." Murray describes it as "a day for families, friends, co-workers, neighbours and organizations to get together to celebrate the ties they share with each other and with the people of Israel. Looking back over five decades, we can reflect on how much our partnership with the people of Israel has accomplished."

Bringing Israel Home

The impact of Israel at 50 will be felt a long time after the year has ended, predicts Julia Koschitzky, Chair of the Israel at 50 Community Celebration.

"Each person has his or her own beliefs and each organization has its own agenda, but when it comes to Israel, we're united," says Koschitzky. "Israel at 50 is a magnet. The amazing thing is the hundreds of volunteers of all ages who have already become a part of it, generating excitement and energy the likes of which I've never before seen," she adds.

Like many in the community, Koschitzky has worked alongside legions of dedicated people on worthwhile projects over the years. But she says Israel at 50 stands apart, not only because of the Toronto community's special ties to Israel, but also because of Israel's profound impact on Jewish identity in general — spiritually, historically and culturally.

Koschitzky expressed gratitude for the commitment of Israel at 50's key committee Chairs: Gerry Sheff, Corporate Sponsorship; Donald Carr and Judy Feld Carr, Chanukah Candle Lighting at Queen's Park; Murray and Marvelle Koffler, Yom Ha'atzmaut Gala; Bonnie Goldstein and Jackie Shulman, Toronto Remembers; Karen Morton, Israel Showcase at the CNE; Judy Scheininger, Consortium Liaison; Terri Weintraub, Volunteer Coordination.

Consortium Fuels Israel at 50

Although the solemn name doesn't even hint at the enthusiasm of its members, the Consortium is the driving force behind Israel at 50 celebrations.

The Consortium is the assembly of nearly 150 groups, agencies, synagogues and organizations, spanning the full spectrum of Jewish life in the Greater Toronto area. Together, they're organizing and promoting the year-long series of events celebrating Israel's 50th anniversary, next year. It's one of the strongest examples in the city's history of the community uniting for a common goal.

The Consortium also serves as a forum where resources can be combined and partnerships encouraged.

"The members' excitement is contagious — and it's spreading," says Consortium Chair Judy Scheininger. "It's gratifying to feel the support of the community for Israel at 50. The eagerness is heart-warming and it's going to show in the celebrations."

Many of the volunteers coming forward — either to initiate events or to help with those already on the calendar — have never before been involved in community activities in quite this way.

"Although it's a diverse group, the members have a common goal of making Israel at 50 an outstanding success throughout the community," says Scheininger. "There's a great deal of mutual respect among members, and our pride and support for Israel is the unifying force."

To help create and support events, members have access to a variety of resources, including promotional material, special videos, speakers and exhibits as they become available. For information about being a part of the Consortium, call (416) 635-2883 ext. 321.

Bank of Canada shows willingness to confront past

Scene in Ottawa

By STEPHEN BINDMAN

So it now appears that on at least one Nazi front, Canada is still Canada the good.

An Ottawa historian has concluded that the Bank of Canada was not a "willing player" in the laundering of Nazi gold looted from banks and Holocaust victims during World War II.

Duncan McDowall, a Carleton University professor, conducted a three-month, exhaustive study – in fact a mind-numbingly exhaustive study as only a dedicated historian could – for the bank, after World Jewish Congress investigators discovered an intelligence document in American archives.

McDowall concluded there is "only the slimmest of chances" that the Canadian central bank was even unwittingly drawn into the laundering of tainted gold by the Swiss and Portuguese central banks.

But the good professor didn't stop there.

He discovered, much to his surprise, that Canada's central bank also safeguarded in its vaults small amounts of gold owned by refugees – many of them well-to-do European Jews who had fled their homelands in the early stages of the war.

Every ounce was returned to its rightful owners after the war.

"Canadians can take justifiable pride in the efficient manner in which the rather prosaic service of earmarking of gold was turned to commendable Allied and, at times, humanitarian ends," he concludes.

McDowall's report should hopefully put to rest any fears of a major Canadian connection to the growing worldwide Nazi gold scandal.

And his revelation about the heretofore-secret safeguarding of Jewish gold in Canada's bank vaults is an interesting footnote to an otherwise shameful episode in Canadian history – a period, as Irving Abella has recounted, in which Canada was apparently prepared to welcome with open arms Nazi persecutors but firmly shut the doors to the persecuted.

But perhaps of equal significance is the way the Bank of Canada reacted to the first revelations about a possible Canadian role in Nazi gold laundering.

Its top officials did not run and hide as government officials are more often wont to do. Instead they immediately conducted an internal probe, then commissioned McDowall, a respected historian, and gave him unfettered access to thousands and thousands of documents in its archives.

They swiftly released the historian's report and made the hundreds of files he pored over available to researchers and the public.

Perhaps this is a sign that Canada is finally prepared to openly come to terms with its dismal record in dealing with the Nazi past.

"The Bank of Canada learned the lesson of Switzerland, that unless you respond immediately and aggressively to a public issue, that issue will fester and get worse and compound the problem," says Abella, who reviewed McDowall's report for the Canadian Jewish Congress.

"This gave Canada the opportunity to wash its laundry in public and it shows that the laundry was clean, our hands were clean, and governments behaved as they should have.

"I'm hopeful that other departments will, if confronted with the same issue, learn that it pays to be open because these things will eventually come out."

The bank's openness and willingness to confront its past, no matter how unpleasant, is even more significant when seen in light of several other recent positive Nazi-related developments:

• The Supreme Court of Canada ruled in September that three Nazi war crimes cases can proceed despite a secret meeting between a top judge and senior federal lawyer.

Powerful message to Federal Court

The top court said Nazi war crimes "rank among the most heinous in history and the civilized world's resolve to apply the appropriate sanctions should not be interfered with lightly."

This was a powerful message to the Federal Court to get on with it, a message that has apparently been received loud and clear.

One suspected Nazi collaborator has already left the country voluntarily, the trial of another has been completed and several more are slated to finally begin over the next few months.

• Justice Minister Anne McLellan has all but apologized for years of inaction by successive Canadian governments in dealing with suspected Nazis living in our territory.

In a recent speech in Edmonton, she announced the federal war crimes unit would soon publish an annual report on its work, much like the superior Office of Special Investigations (OSI) in Washington. Her predecessor Allan Rock had refused to make such a public accounting.

"In the last few years, we have seen a major improvement in the way those who committed reprehensible acts during wartime are dealt with in this country," McLellan said.

"Canada's improved performance does not excuse, or lessen the shame, of its previous inaction and failures."

• McLellan will also shortly announce the appointment of famed American Nazi hunter Neal Sher, the former director of the OSI, as a special advisor to Canadian war crimes investigators.

Too little too late? Probably.

But better late than never.

Rambam slams gov't

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — U.S. Nazi-hunter Steven Rambam said the Canadian government is "scamming the Jewish community" by launching deportation cases "they want to lose."

Rambam was in Montreal last week to speak at a local synagogue, and in an interview, continued to criticize the federal government for its handling of suspected Nazi war criminals living in Canada.

But in doing so, Rambam also seemed to alienate a past ally, the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC).

CJC allied itself with Rambam last year after he revealed the presence of dozens of suspected Nazis living in Canada, whom he tricked into admitting to their Nazi past. Earlier this year, he announced he would retire from the war crimes agenda.

But Rambam's brash, no-holds-barred style and apparent continued readiness to slam Ottawa comes at a time when CJC is willing, at least for the time being, to give the federal government the benefit of the doubt that it is pursuing the war crimes agenda seriously after 50 years of indifference and a history of being a safe haven for Nazi war criminals.

Ottawa has launched a dozen deportation cases, with more coming. One of the cases is against Montrealer Vladimir Katriuk, accused of lying about his membership in the Waffen SS to enter Canada in 1951. On the day Rambam spoke, Katriuk's hearing began in Montreal in Federal Court.

CJC national director Jack Silverstone praised Rambam for his past efforts and said he was entitled to his personal views.

However, "based on meetings with [former justice minister Allan Rock, current minister Anne McLellan and Immigration Minister Lucienne Robillard], and based on the situation we see before the courts today, I know there is an unprecedented level of proceedings against suspected Nazi war criminals," Silverstone said.

In an interview and before a capacity crowd of 450 at the Beth Israel Beth Aaron Synagogue, Rambam continued to call on Ottawa to "flip" suspected Nazi war criminals into testifying as "cooperative witnesses" against their accomplices, a tactic commonly used in the United States by the Office of Special Investigations (OSI), the American counterpart to the Canadian War Crimes Unit, but not so far by Canadian authorities.

To support his point that the Canadian government has no real interest in winning its deportation cases, Rambam cited "glaring" examples, among them the failed criminal prosecutions of Imre Finta, Michael Pawlowski and Stephen Reistetter.

War crimes case begins

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Vladimir Katriuk, a 76-year-old beekeeper in Ormstown, Que., last week said he was not concerned that the Federal Court will strip him of his citizenship and Canada deport him for allegedly hiding his Nazi past to get into Canada in 1951.

"No, not at all," Katriuk, a citizen since 1958, answered when asked by reporters if he was worried about his future.

Katriuk appeared during two of three days of hearings last week in Federal Court. Court watchers said he appeared alert and attentive, but displayed no emotion, as his lawyer, Orest Rudzik, and federal Crown prosecutor David Lucas presented the thrust of their arguments before Judge Marc Nadon.

The dramatic heart of the case, which could include eyewitness testimony of Katriuk participating in atrocities, is not due to be dealt with until March. At that time, the hearing will move to Ukraine, where the Crown will call witnesses who are expected to testify that they knew Katriuk as a Nazi collaborator and member of a notorious Ukrainian battalion of the Waffen SS, the 400-member Schutzmannschaft Battalion 118.

Lucas said one witness will produce a statement that Katriuk was bestowed a medal as a member of the battalion's first platoon, an elite unit.

From 1942 to 1944, the battalion committed numerous atrocities against Jews and the civilian population in the Ukraine and in Byelorussia.

The atrocities, according to court documents, included the extermination of the Jewish ghetto in Slutsk, Byelorussia, and "operations" in other villages in which "over 100 civilians, many of them old people and children, were killed, and many houses and barns were burned down."

The Crown alleges that Katriuk participated in the atrocities, did not reveal his past when he applied to come to Canada and came under a false name, Nicolas Schpirka. All would have been grounds for rejecting his admission.

Katriuk, in a statement prepared by the defence, admitted to serving in Battalion 118, but denies being present while atrocities took place.

He also said he revealed his true identity when applying for citizenship, but was still allowed to become a full Canadian.

The hearing is the first Nazi war crimes case to take place in Montreal (another, against St. Leonard resident Mamertas Rolland Maciukas, is expected to begin in the late spring of next year).

If Katriuk is stripped of his citizenship and the federal immigration minister deports him, it will be one of the very few deportations so far of a Canadian and alleged Nazi war criminal since Jacob Luitjens of Vancouver was exiled to Holland in 1992. Katriuk's fate is not expected to be determined until at least the fall of 1998.

New fundraising options explored in Winnipeg

By MYRON LOVE
Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Winnipeg Jewish Community Council (WJCC) has appointed Howard Morry to chair its newly created Financial Resource Development Millenium Committee. The committee was authorized at the WJCC meeting in early October.

Morry, a lawyer who currently serves as the WJCC's vice-president for financial resource development, came up with the idea for the committee. "I was concerned that our Combined Jewish Appeal (CJA) campaign has been declining for several years," he says. "With the shift of our focus to the Asper Jewish Community Campus, I wanted to be proactive in exploring new fundraising options for the community, rather than waiting for a financial crisis to happen."

CJA campaign declining

The new committee is now made up of about a dozen members, but Morry expects it to grow to 40 or 50 people who will represent a wide range in age and experience. Committee members will be studying community long-term needs, the current CJA campaign and, creative new ways of raising funds.

"Perhaps we can encourage supporters to establish endowment funds or contribute through life insurance policies," Morry suggests. "We may look to public and private foundations or special fundraising projects. Our beneficiary agencies such as the Gray Academy and Jewish Child & Family Service may be able to increase their own fundraising efforts."

He expects that his committee will have its report completed by next fall. In the meantime, he says that this year's CJA campaign is up substantially over last year.

"חול בעיניים":
זהו שם של ספר הבלש הרביעי מסידרת ספרי "ליזי" של שולמית לפיד. ליזי בדיחי היא כתבת מקומון (עיתון מקומי) בבאר שבע, שתוך עבודתה העיתונאית נופלת על מקרי פשע ומפענחת אותם. המיוחד בליזי ובכל הגישה של שולמית לפיד, היא הפוזה ה"אנטי-גיבורית". בחורה לא יפה וגמלונית, בעיר נידחת, משהוא קצת דומה למיסיס מרפל של אגאתה קריסטי. ללמדך שהגיון בריא וחושים בריאים יותר חשובים ממציאות של בלשים. גם ב"חול בעיניים" נקלעת ליזי בדיחי למקום הלא נכון בזמן הלא נכון וחושפת בצע כסף וקינאה, אהבה ובגידה. אני דווקא אוהב את הכתיבה של שולמית לפיד, כמו גם את ספרי הבלש של בתיה גור, לא בגלל הקטע הבלשי, אלא משום שבתוך עלילת המתח הן מתארות מאוד פלאסטי את ישראל של עכשיו. הינה קטע כזה:

"סגירת המפעל העלתה אל פני השטח שנאה כלפי הפועלים הרוסים. במקום שיראו בהם בני ברית ואחים לצרה, נתפסו הרוסים לפולשים שגזלו את פת לחמם של הפועלים הותיקים . הסוכנות היהודית שילמה חלק משכרם של העולים החדשים ובעלי המפעל קפצו על המציאה... כשהסוכנות הפסיקה לשלם את שכרם הם פוטרו, ורוסים חדשים הוכנסו במקומם".

איך גבר ישראלי מתאבד?
הוא קופץ מהאגו שלו לאי קיו שלו.

על מדליות ודגלים-יהורם פירוצקי:
ערב אחד, ליד שולחן עמוס פיצוחים ישבתי עם חברים, ביניהם קנדים ממוצא לועזי. בשיחה שהגיעה לטונים גבוהים, טענו הנוכרים שאנו הישראלים פטריוטים בעירבון לא מוגבל, שוביניסטים ובעיקר מיליטריסטים. רצה הגורל ויומיים אחרי אותו ויכוח השתתפתי בנשף צדקה שנתי של האופרה הקנדית, נשף שנחשב לאחד האירועים הנוצצים והחשובים עבור העשירון העליון. והכוונה למתבוללי Rosdale ,Foresthill ועוד שכונות מצוקה. וכאן להפתעתי הלא גדולה גיליתי שרוב הגברים, הצעירים והמזדקנים, הגיעו לאירוע עטורים בחליפות טוקסידו של גדולי המעצבים, כשעל החזה תלויות בגאווה מדליות, עיטורים, ועוד תכשיטים צבאיים ממלחמת העולם השניה, קוריאה, ושאר המלחמות והסכסוכים שקנדה הצליחה להידחף לתוכם. מאוחר יותר, כאשר מושלת אונטריו ביצעה כניסה לאולם המפואר, נכנסו יחד איתה בת"ס"ח שלא היה מביש את צוערי בית הספר לטיסה של חיל האוויר, אורחי שולחן הכבוד מלווים חיילים במדי ייצוג צבעוניים כשבידיהם רובים מכודנים, ובראשם סקוטי עם חמת חלילים. וכך לצלילי המנון שקעתי בהרהורים, ניסיתי לזכור אם גם אנחנו הישראלים מגיעים לאירועים נוצצים כשעל חזינו מתנדנדים עיטורים או אותות צבאיים, ומתי נשיא המדינה או ראש הממשלה מבציעים כניסה לערב צדקה בין טורים של חיילים חמושים? מיותר לציין שזה לא קורה. אז מדוע בכל זאת מזכים אותנו הקנדים בתואר מיליטריסטים, שוביניסטים , כאשר בעצם הם אלו שמניפים דגלים על תחנות דלק, פיצריות, סופרמרקטים ואפילו דוכני המבורגרים. וזה בלי להזכיר את כל הפעמים שעמדנו לשיר "או קנדה" לפני הופעת בלאט , אופרה ועוד כל מיני אירועים אפורים.

Family's struggle for identity a disturbing story

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — "Whatever you do, don't tell anyone you're a Jew. It could mean your life."

These words were spoken, not in wartime Europe, but in the 1960s in Ottawa by Dr. Bernie Sheridan, formerly Sigal, speaking to his wife and seven children.

When the Sheridan family's story of fear and paranoia was detailed in the Ottawa Citizen in May 1997, it so shocked and disturbed local readers that it became the catalyst for a joint project of community cooperation and understanding.

Frannie Sheridan, author and performer of a one-woman play about her life, began performing it in 1995 in Vancouver, where she now lives. An Ottawa reporter who had seen the show wrote about it – and about the family's struggle for an identity.

Following the appearance of the article, members of both Temple Israel and St. Basil's Catholic Church, which the Sheridans had attended, immediately and independently contacted Sheridan with a request that she bring her play to her home town. The resulting collaboration between the two congregations succeeded not only in bringing the play home, but is viewed by members of both as an important step in Christian-Jewish dialogue.

Sheridan and her six siblings were the children of Holocaust survivors who had come to Canada to start life anew but were never able to fully recover from the trauma of their past.

Encountering anti-Semitism here in Canada, Bernie Sheridan decided to change the family name and religion in an attempt to protect them all from the evil he saw lurking around every corner.

So well kept was the Sheridans' secret that most of their neighbors and fellow church members had no idea that an elaborate charade was being played out.

Although they had been estranged for some time, Sheridan's three sisters and one of her brothers returned to Ottawa to be in the audience and give her support during her two sold-out performances at the Canadian Museum of Civilization.

Jewish War Orphans help launch Holocaust exhibit

BY DAVID J. LITVAK
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — Open Hearts-Closed Doors, the first travelling exhibit to be developed by the Vancouver Holocaust Education Centre, opened last month with a reception featuring speeches by local Jewish war orphans.

At the reception, held at the Jewish Community Centre of Greater Vancouver, Cantor Yaacov Orzech of Schara Tzedeck Synagogue led participants in a stirring rendition of Where Can We Go, a song that was sung by Jewish orphans while waiting in Displaced Persons Camps.

The exhibit is one of a number of activities taking place across the country to mark the 50th anniversary of the arrival of the 1,123 Jewish war orphans into 38 communities across Canada.

The orphans, who lost their parents in the Holocaust, made their way to Canada between 1947 and 1949, thanks to an Order in Council of the Canadian government, and the efforts of the Canadian Jewish Congress, its affiliated agencies and Jewish communities across the country.

Illustrates official attitudes towards Jews

The exhibit illustrates the official attitudes of Canadian policy-makers towards Jews during this period by highlighting the words of Prime Minister Mackenzie King who in 1938 said "I fear we would have riots if we agreed to a policy that admitted numbers of Jews."

The exhibit also traces the events that led up to the Holocaust, depicts the holding camps that the orphans stayed in while awaiting their fate, and features individual stories and documents of Jewish orphans.

Roberta Kremer, executive director of the Holocaust Education Centre, says that the exhibit, designed for students, "has a strong educational component," featuring hands-on material and kits specially designed for schools.

It is collapsible and contains no precious materials so it can be easily moved.

Kremer says that when the exhibit travels across the country, she hopes it will incorporate the stories of Jewish Canadian orphans in other cities.

"It was designed so that Jewish communities across the country could personalize the exhibit to reflect the experiences of orphans in their own cities," she said.

Bill Gluck, an orphan who originally settled in Montreal but now lives in Vancouver says, "My intention is not to exhibit myself, but I want people and especially children to understand the story of the Jewish war orphans."

Gluck will talk to students in universities and high schools "to counter Holocaust deniers."

Open Hearts-Closed Doors will be displayed at the Vancouver Holocaust Education Centre from Monday to Friday until March 31.

For further information about the exhibit call (604)264-0499 or fax (604)264-0497.

Exhibit marks centenary of Canadian Jewish press

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — The centenary of the Jewish press in Canada was recently marked by the National Library of Canada.

An exhibition entitled The Canadian Jewish Press, 1897-1997, which closed recently, highlighted Jewish newspapers from the National Library's extensive collection.

A commemorative lecture by CJN editor Mordechai Ben-Dat was given in conjunction with the exhibition.

The first Jewish newspaper in Canada, The Jewish Times, was founded in Montreal in 1897 in response to the anti-Semitism stirred up by the Dreyfus case in France. The newspapers, magazines, journals and books that followed have dealt with a wide range of topics.

The Jewish press has been used to educate, inform and entertain. Publications have appeared in English, French, Yiddish, Hebrew, Hungarian and Russian.

Not only the topics are of interest, but the authors as well. Poets, novelists and journalists have been given a forum in the Jewish press that many were not able to find elsewhere. Only in recent years have many of these writers become well known and popular in the general press as well.

This exhibition provided a glimpse of the Canadian Jewish community over the past century. Newspapers and clippings told the stories of the people, the events, the attitudes and the political climate over the years. Reports of local fundraising dinners, pleas for families to take in war orphans, samples of poetry and prose are available in the archives at the National Library of Canada.

The exhibition was curated by Cheryl Jaffee, curator of the Jacob M. Lowy Collection. Lewis Levendel, author of A Century of the Canadian Jewish Press: 1880s-1980s, served as consultant.

Ryerson U holding exams on Saturday

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Ryerson Polytechnic University professor Bob Greenberg has taken a strong public stand against Saturday exams, but Jewish students affected by the scheduling, with exams on Dec. 6 and 13, are keeping a lower profile.

"There are a lot of people who are borderline comfortable with Saturday exams, and end up writing them because they don't feel like cutting through the red tape," said Ilana Segal, co-president of Ryerson Hillel and a third-year social work student.

The hassle, for some of the school's estimated 1,200 Jewish students, may include obtaining a rabbi's letter to prove religious affiliation.

Ryerson's exam policy states that if an exam cannot be rescheduled to avoid conflict with a religious holiday, the students "shall be evaluated by other means, which may include another examination scheduled at a different time...The faculty may require verification of the circumstances on which the request is based."

Zac Kaye, director of Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto, has no problem with the idea of writing letters on behalf of students who have exam conflicts. "It's generally acceptable to have to provide proof," he said.

Social work students can now fill out a form instead of obtaining a letter from the rabbi, noted Segal, an observant Jew who has rescheduled her exams every semester since she began the program. She arranged her own proctor each time, she said last week in a phone interview.

Greenberg, a professor of architectural science and landscape architecture, is a self-described atheist with no particular religious affiliation. In a scathing letter to the campus publication the Ryersonian, he asked, "Why are the Jews, who have their weekly observance on Saturday as is known to everyone, except perhaps the registrar, singled out?...Kind of smacks of wearing yellow stars or maybe pink triangles so those interested in such matters can identify the 'other ones.'"

Greenberg also quoted the university's aim, as written in its Vision Task Group's final report, "to dedicate itself to...[an] environment which is accessible, diverse, equitable and free from discrimination and harassment."

To the best of his knowledge, none of his students are affected, although some of his Muslim students would be unable to write Friday afternoon exams, he said in a phone interview. "I don't want to know what my students' religious beliefs are...It has nothing to do with our teaching here.

"This smacks of tolerating, not celebrating. I have no use for that. Tolerating is what you do for a boil on your neck. I want acceptance," Greenberg told The CJN.

Problems during chagim

Scheduling conflicts arise at "every campus," said Kaye, who has worked on campuses here and in Vancouver, as well as in Australia. "We just dealt with it at Scarborough [College at the University of Toronto], very amicably. We met with the dean. Even at York [University, which has a large, cohesive Jewish student population], we had problems during the chagim with one particular class. That was resolved. In Guelph, we had the same problem. It's a problem perenially."

Stephanie Wener, program coordinator at Ryerson Hillel, has had a few students approach her about Saturday exams. "They're obviously quite upset about it. They're not Orthodox. They don't keep Shabbat, but that's not the point. They still feel uncomfortable writing an exam on Saturday."

The university's registrar, Keith Alnwick, hasn't received any complaints about Saturday exams in the five years he's held the position, he said. He did not respond directly to Greenberg, but answered questions about the issue in an interview for a subsequent Ryersonian article.

Alnwick is "not unaware" of the problem, he told The CJN, as both his wife and daughter are Jewish. He said it's "overstatement" to call it a controversy.

"We recognize and fully value the religious observance issue, and we will make arrangements. We're geared up for this," he said. Not scheduling exams on Friday afternoons and Saturdays in the first place is not an option, he said.

Segal believes it's "unrealistic" to expect the administration to acknowledge every culture, but she bemoaned the ignorance of some of her professors regarding Jewish holidays.

"I ended up feeling stupid for insisting I really did have a holiday. I felt, instead of [them] apologizing and saying, 'Sorry this is conflicting with your religious day,' [the attitude was,] 'You'd better prove you're not lying.'"

An additional source of discomfort for her and, she believes, for other students, is the issue of confidentiality. "Other people definitely don't want people to know they're Jewish. Sometimes I've taken a Saturday exam on a Friday, and other students ask, 'Can I call you and find out what was on it?' Sometimes I'd prefer that people not know I was taking an exam on a different day."

Salon/spa opens in Hazelton Lanes

By CAROL WISE
Special to The CJN

A new extraordinary salon-spa, Femme Coiffure, opens in Hazelton Lanes, Toronto, this week.

This playground of beauty offers hair design, makeup and full esthetic services, including spa days. The luxurious setting will cater to your every need. Even a brief visit to Femme Coiffure is uplifting and pampering.

This business originated in Montreal with the Reboh brothers: Marcelle, Raphael, Daniel and Gabriel. Their flagship store in Montreal is often visited by celebrities like Ivana Trump, Claudia Schiffer and Carla Collins.

The designers followed their dream of beauty from Israel where they were born and raised.

Today, with three salons, the brothers alternate between Toronto, Montreal and Bal Harbor in Florida. One brother will always be at the helm of each salon, making sure every client experiences the utmost in service and comfort.

The brothers are dedicated to perfecting and enhancing a woman's natural beauty.

"Hairstyle depends on the perfect cut," says Raphael. "The cut is everything and is the secret of great hair." He believes that after a cut, a woman should be able to style her own hair easily at home.

Color is also very important and the brothers agree that before coloring, the hair should be cut and dried, as the cut helps determine the color.

The most popular look for hair in 1998 will be soft, sexy and easy-to-care for, they say.

The full esthetic services are provided by an array of certified, highly trained staff, who ensure an individualized adventure into a euphoric state of relaxation.

Among the myriad of body treatments offered by Femme Coiffure is the Hydrotherapy Bath. This 128-jet bath uses pressurized air and water to leave you feeling so good, you might want to shout "Hallelujah!"

Makeup at Femme Coiffure will help bring out and improve your own unique elements of beauty. Products are personalized and you will receive the undivided attention of skilled artists who will create the best and most current look for you.

The buzz of energy in Hazelton Lanes is clearly due to the excitement and anticipation of the opening of Femme Coiffure. Treat yourself to the ultimate in relaxation and let the experts turn your dreams of beauty into reality.

New winter clothing for kids is comfortable and easy to wear

By ANITA SZABADI-GOTTESMAN
Special to The CJN

I awoke recently, threw open the blind and did a double take when I saw the season's first snowfall blanketing the neighborhood – a little earlier than usual.

Visions of digging my way out of the snow banks and getting into a cold car flashed through my mind. My kids, on the other hand, shrieked with joy, dressed and ate faster than on any other morning and ran outside to revel in the fresh snow.

I think part of the reason they are so willing to run outside is that winter clothing on the market today is so much more comfortable and easy to wear than it was in our day. Gone are the cumbersome, overstuffed snow suits that hampered every step we took. They have been replaced by snow gear in new fabrics that are lightweight, colorful and extremely durable, allowing for comfort and versatility.

Ronnie Lubov, senior vice-president of Robin International Inc., a fashion leader in Canadian outerwear for children, says that today's kids snowwear must answer consumer needs.

"When we design a garment, we always do it with these three criteria in mind," says Lubov. "It must be practical, fashionable and affordable."

Let's face it – if anything you purchase for your children these days is not stylish or 'cool,' they will not put it on. Today's kids are fashion savvy and try to dictate as much as possible (or as much as their parents let them get away with) what they will and will not wear.

Fabrics for fall and winter 1997 feature a wide variety of fashionable materials in oxford nylon, velour, suedeine, and a relative newcomer – anti-slide fabric. These materials are embossed and quilted with large and small diamond quilting.

Snowsuits for girls are often trimmed with a two-tone frosted tip fun fur on hoods and cuffs. Animal prints are big, featuring gold and silver leopard trim on textured fabrics. Snowpants are baggier this year and may be to-the-waist pullons or bibbed with suspenders. Lubov points out that durability is extremely important in snowsuit design. Double fabric, often in contrasting colors, is added at the knees for extra protection.

This year, snowboard gear is especially popular. The outfits are unisex and according to Lubov, the hottest colors are tan, black, brown, aubergine, cement (off-white) and hunter green.

"Kids are crazy about the snowboarding line," says Lubov. "These suits are both functional and hi-tech from a kid's perspective, 'really cool.'"

Many jackets are of the zippered pop-over-the-head type that kids seem to prefer.

The collection features textured surfaces and rubberized anti-slide dot and square patterns. Keen attention is paid to detail and suits are accessorized with metallic clips, holographic crests and fancy woven tape. Most outfits come with matching hats. Lubov stresses that all Robin International Inc. snowsuits are machine washable.

Interrupted Life of Etty Hillesum story of 'an extraordinary person'

By DOROTHY LICHTBLAU
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — It's a mellow autumn day, but the energy inside Leslie Robbins' comfortable North Toronto home crackles. Only a few weeks away from the opening of her play, The Interrupted Life of Etty Hillesum, Robbins, an established professional storyteller, is busy with phone calls, rehearsals, meetings and promotion.

When the production opens on Dec. 11 at the Studio Theatre of the Ford Centre for the Performing Arts, the audience will view the culmination of over three years work.

"The only actor on stage, Robbins will tell Hillesum's story with the help of voices and figures conveyed through various media and will be supported by musician Dan Golden.

In 1994, looking for stories from the Holocaust era, Robbins discovered Etty Hillesum, a young Dutch-Jew who was killed during the Shoah. A friend had given Robbins a book of Hillesum's writing and she was deeply touched by what she read.

Robbins describes Hillesum as "an ordinary and extraordinary person. She was ordinary in her human desires and frailties; extraordinary in that she was a visionary and writer."

A native of Amsterdam and the daughter of well-to-do, assimilated Jews, Hillesum was bright, educated and introspective. Searching for meaning and vocation at a time when the Nazis were threatening, Hillesum is seen in her writing as a moody, highly intelligent and restless woman exploring her sexual and creative impulses.

A woman with status, wealth and many friends who were willing to hide her during the Nazi occupation, Hillesum instead chose to share the suffering of those entrapped by the Nazis.

Robbins quotes Hillesum as saying, "It is sheer arrogance to think of oneself as too good to share the fate of the masses."

In 1941, Hillesum voluntarily joined the hundreds who were transported to Westerbork, the transit camp for Dutch Jews who would be sent to Auschwitz.

In Westerbork, she committed herself to comforting and aiding the detainees. Astonishingly, despite the emotional strain of life in the camp, Hillesum recorded the circumstances in Westerbork through letters to friends in Amsterdam.

Reportedly the only eye-witness account of Westerbork, it is her legacy to subsequent generations. She died in Auschwitz on Nov. 30, 1943.

"I'd like people to say that they are glad they got to know Etty Hillesum, a woman who was a visionary and who lived according to her ideals," Robbins said.

Presented by Leslie Robbins' company, Jewish Storytelling Arts, the play is directed by Miriam Lawrence and is produced by Robbins' daughter Tamara. Helen Porter was the production's script consultant.

Actor tackles eight random roles

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

Diane Flacks

TORONTO — In her latest incarnation, actor Diane Flacks is Antontella Bergman, a fiery Italian-Jewish cultural icon.

"I wanted her to be Italian-Jewish, but her nuances and mannerisms, reflecting my own upbringing, are Jewish," said Flacks.

Bergman, who is confined to a wheelchair as a result of a random act of violence, is one of the eight characters Flacks plays in her new one-woman production, Random Acts, at Buddies in Bad Times Theatre until Dec. 14. Call 975-8555 for tickets or 595-5605 for information.

Another character in the show is the biblical Sarah, age 90 and pregnant, who is so laid back she laughs at her condition.

It's all part of Flacks' irreverent humor as she tackles the urban wilderness of North American millennial angst. As Bergman puts it: "It's the end of the millennium and everyone is rangy. Face it, say it. I am rangy and I want to blame someone for it."

Post-feminist squeegee kids, trash-talking TV aficionados and spiritually bereft disciples are part of the polyglot crew.

A graduate of Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, Flacks says Random Acts is representative of "my full Jewish self," but is not primarily a play of Jewish content, as was Theory of Relatives, about Passover, which appeared at Tarragon Theatre.

Instead, the multiplicity of characters allows her to introduce people who have comments to make about current Canadian events in the mode of her off-the-wall humor. One is Lisa, Bergman's assistant, whose marriage has broken up, also as a result of a random act.

Flacks credits director Alisa Palmer, artistic director of Nightwood Theatre, for helping her with the script. It is produced by Leslie Lester.

Jacob Two-Two will leave kids howling

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Outlandish costumes and the disgusting grossness of characters like Leo Louse and I.M. Greedyguts had 6- and 7-year-olds howling with laughter at a recent performance of Jacob Two-Two's First Spy Case at Young Peoples Theatre.

Mordecai Richler's third play about the boy who says everything twice in order to be heard stars Bialik Hebrew Day School student Dylan Rosenthal, who alternates the title role with Matthew Burns. (Rosenthal will be featured in an article on an upcoming CJN Kids page.)

Once again, Jacob Two-Two, now 8 years old, gets the better of the adult villains in the play, with the help of older siblings Noah (Michael Blake) and Emma (Caitriona Murphy), aka the Fearless O'Toole and the Intrepid Shapiro, along with an eccentric new neighbor, X. Barnaby Dinglebat, Master Spy (John Dolan).

The aforementioned Greedyguts (Guy Bannerman), a boorish glutton, is headmaster at Jacob's school. To punish Jacob, Greedyguts forces him to eat double portions of school lunches prepared by even more boorish Leo Louse (Cliff Saunders), the school cook.

In the finale that is Rosenthal's favorite part of the play, Child Power triumphs and the villains are duly punished.

The musical production, directed by Maja Ardal, runs to Jan. 4.

New twist on tradition

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

An exhibition of Judaica at A Show of Hands, a craft gallery featuring Canadian artists, has put a contemporary twist on tradition.

Curated by owner Sara Levine-Petroff, the exhibition evolved after she put out a call to all provincial craft councils inviting artists to submit their portfolios.

"We invited artists to create contemporary interpretations of Judaic objects in mixed-media format," says Levine-Petroff.

A seder plate created by Marsha McCarthy is titled Liberation. The front of the plate depicts, among other things, Moses holding the cup of Elijah toward the evening sky to represent the beginning of Passover. The cup holds 10 drops of wine. In the plate's centre are the four promises made by G-d to the Israelites.

The border is divided into six sections in the shape of the Star of David, upon which sit the ceremonial foods. The back of the plate, seen because it is mounted on a mirrored pedestal, is divided into 12 sections, each depicting one of the 12 tribes.

Yossi Steinberg, born in Israel and a former student at the Bezalel Institute of Art and Design, used silver-plated wire and artists' acrylic resin to handpaint brightly colored, one-of-a-kind mezuzot.

A menorah created by Kevin MacLean is made of recycled material. "My work reflects the union of modern components with traditional designs, and is influenced by the late 19th century sense of style and attention to detail. Because the variety of objects is constantly in flux, my work is very much an organic process and each finished design is unique," he says.

Judd Shemesh, born in Iraq and raised in Israel, has lived in Canada for over 20 years. He says he chose glass as his medium because of "its timelessness."

The exhibition is at A Show of Hands, 1947 Avenue Rd., until Dec. 13.

VANCOUVER'S MUSEUM OF ANTHROPOLOGY

Last month's APEC conference brought some 30 world leaders to Vancouver – and to its wonderful Museum of Anthropology on the campus of the University of British Columbia.

Situated on a dramatic wind-swept cliff overlooking the Georgia Strait and the snow-capped peaks of the Coast Mountains, the Museum of Anthropology pays homage to the art of the Northwest Coast First Nations in several important and pioneering ways.

The museum, which opened in 1976, was designed by internationally renowned Canadian architect Arthur Erickson and is considered one of his signature buildings.

The design uses a series of huge receding cement frames, evoking the cedar post-and-beam method of construction of traditional Haida longhouses. Thirteen-metre high glass walls introduce as much natural light as possible while preserving the breathtaking view.

Set against the sweeping landscape of water and mountains and sky, the magnificent totem poles and statues of mythological beings on display seem to come alive in the monumental Great Hall.

"The museum should reassure our [native peoples] of the greatness of their culture, and perhaps give them back some of their dignity and confidence," the Vancouver-born Erickson has explained.

The museum pioneered a new way for institutions to look at native art, says its director, Dr. Ruth Phillips. "Typically, you would find these objects displayed in natural history museums that also presented botany, geology and zoology. Very often they were presented as anthropological artifacts because they held information about cultures or nature – but not because they were beautiful to look at."

'African and Oceanic carvings were great art'

The museum, which holds some 25,000 objects in its ethnographic collections and about 80,000 artifacts in its archeological collections, has borrowed a mode of perceiving non-Western art that "goes back to the early modernist painters at the beginning of the 20th century," Phillips said.

"Artists like Picasso, Braque and others promoted the idea that African and Oceanic carvings were great art, not just scientific specimens. It took longer for North American native art to be appreciated that way."

While the museum is best known for its collection of Northwest Coast native art, including ceremonial masks, it has an eclectic acquisitions policy. The largest number of objects in its collections are actually from Asia. It also features African art, art from India, and the Walter Koerner collection of European ceramics.

Besides the permanent collection, several temporary exhibitions are currently on view. One exhibit, Written in the Earth, provides insight into the CoastSalish people (until Dec. 31). Another, From Under the Delta, features rare preserved wood items retrieved from the lower Fraser, up to 4,600 years old (until April 1, 1998). Early Chinese Art from the Victor Shaw Collection is now running until the spring.

The museum, which receives about 170,000 visitors per year, has been described as "the only world-class museum in Vancouver." 6393 N.W. Marine Dr., Vancouver. Adult admission $6. Admission free on Tuesday evenings, 5 to 9 p.m. Interpretive guided tours available. 604-822-3825.

Former lieutenant governor relives own experience

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Jean-Louis Roux is known in Quebec for his distinguished acting career, but his name became known in other parts of Canada only after his much-publicized resignation as Quebec's lieutenant-governor.

Roux has chosen to relive that experience in the theatrical arena by playing the leading role in Past Imperfect, a radio drama inspired by the situation.

Written by Toronto playwright Emil Sher, Past Imperfect will air on CBC Radio One on Dec 14 at 10 p.m. and on Radio Two on Dec. 15 at 9 p.m.

Prime Minister Jean Chrétien appointed Roux, 74, lieutenant-governor in August 1996. Roux resigned from the post three months later, after a Quebec magazine revealed that in 1942, he had worn a swastika and participated in an anti-conscription protest that degenerated into an anti-Semitic riot.

Shortly after this disclosure, Roux met with the leaders of the Montreal Jewish community to apologize for his past actions.

Neither the Jewish community nor the prime minister called for his resignation, but there was pressure from sovereigntists who had openly opposed Roux's appointment – he's a staunch federalist – as lieutenant-governor.

In an interview at the Canadian Broadcasting Centre following the recent taping of Past Imperfect, Roux said that what he did in his youth "was unacceptable."

He explained that as a Québécois nationalist in his youth, he wore the swastika to protest forced conscription in Quebec. At the time, he said, he had no idea what was happening to the Jews in Europe.

And while he accepted full responsibility for his behavior 55 years ago, Roux stressed that he was never a Nazi sympathizer. "The press, [however] had come to the conclusion that I was a Nazi."

Once he announced his resignation, the media changed its tune and was very sympathetic to him, he noted.

He said the separatists were politically motivated when they pushed for his resignation because they objected to his strong federalist stance.

When asked why he would choose to be in a play that would stir up painful memories of the controversy, Roux said he is foremost an actor; his wife urged him to take the part because Past Imperfect is fiction. "Many details are different."

In a telephone interview, Sher said Roux's resignation "was a seed to explore morality and forgiveness, to explore the issues the Roux affair raised.

"In the immediate aftermath, I was drawn to the moral questions largely related to forgiveness. When we do something in the past, to what extend do we have to pay for the sins of our youth in light of our later accomplishments?"

He pointed out that while the play's protagonist, Michel Beauchemin, is loosely based on Roux in terms of age and nationality, the plot and details of Past Imperfect is completely fictional.

In the play, Beauchemin, an extreme Quebec nationalist in his youth, takes part in an anti-Jewish demonstration in 1939, which ends with the stoning death of a Jewish storekeeper.

Deeply affected by this death, Beauchemin becomes a humanitarian. At the start of the play he is about to be honored for his humanitarianism by the Montreal Jewish community when the community learns that Beauchemin participated in the 1939 riot.

Sher said he was thrilled when Roux agreed to take the leading role. "He was the logical choice for the part because he is so highly regarded. He's a wonderful actor. It's to his credit that he took the part and it is only because he is completely at peace [with his resignation] that he was able to take the role."

New Jacobovici film launched at fundraiser

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — If audience appreciation is any indicator of a film's success, then Simcha Jacobovici's latest documentary, Hollywoodism: Jews, Movies and the American Dream, which premiered recently at the Princess of Wales Theatre, can be hailed as a triumph.

Spontaneous cheering erupted the moment the film ended. The applause continued as the credits rolled, and it intensified when Jacobovici, the film's director, writer and producer, took the stage.

Produced by Jacobovici and Elliott Halpern of Associated Producers, Hollywoodism follows the lives of the first generation of Jewish American movie moguls, among them, Adolph Zukor, founder of Paramount Pictures; Carl Laemmle, founder of Universal Pictures; the Warner brothers; Louis B. Mayer, founder of Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer (MGM); William Fox of 20th Century Fox; and Harry Cohn, head of Columbia Pictures. They were all immigrants or the children of immigrants.

Rare archival footage

Using rare archival footage and home movies, clips from dozens of Hollywood film classics, first-hand accounts of the moguls' lives through interviews with their children and grandchildren as well as comments from film historians and critics, Hollywoodism chronicles the rise of the moguls in the early decades of this century when they ruled the movie industry, to their fall in the mid '50s.

It took Jacobovici five years before he could make the film after optioning the rights through Propaganda Pictures in 1992. In addition to securing the financing, he also had to get the rights to the old film clips and track down the archival footage, he said.

In a post-screening question and answer period author Neal Gabler, whose book, An Empire of Their Own: How the Jews Invented Hollywood, inspired the film, said he was "blown away" by the film.

"It's intellectually powerful. It's esthetically powerful and it's emotionally powerful."

He pointed out that the film is not a literal adaptation of his book. "It's Simcha and Stuart's vision. All the credit is due to them."

The film boldly contends that the American dream as defined by Hollywood was a Jewish invention, rooted in the moguls' desire to reinvent themselves as Americans to gain acceptance by the gentile mainstream society.

And while most audience members praised the artistry and entertainment value of Hollywoodism, some people commented privately that they disagreed with the film's basic premise.

Nevertheless, there was no disputing that, based on the strong evidence presented by Jacobovici, the moguls espoused strong assimilationist tendencies – they celebrated Christmas, married gentile wives and anglicized the names of the Jewish actors.

Jacobovici said he dealt with the moguls with compassion. "I felt sorry for them. I felt sorry for their assimilationist fantasies…I hope the film makes people proud of who they are and that they buy out of their assimilationist fantasies."

The premiere for the feature-length documentary was also a gala fundraiser for the Bloor Jewish Community Centre, the Riverdale Jewish Community Centre and the Toronto Jewish Film Festival. Some 2,000 people attended. A post-screening party for gala patrons was sponsored by the Arts and Entertainment Network (A&E) and Malofilm Distribution.

Ralph Benmurgui of CBC television hosted the evening, which included speeches by entertainment lawyer, Michael Levine, executive co-producer of the film; Bob Culbert CBC's executive director of news, current affairs and Newsworld; and Brooke Johnson, vice-president and general manager of A&E.

U.S. calls for 'credible' redeployment plan

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has less than two weeks to develop what the United States calls a "credible" plan for redeploying from the West Bank.

U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright said she plans to meet again with Netanyahu in Europe as early as Dec. 17. American officials said Albright expects at that meeting to hear details on the scope of the redeployment.

Albright, who is pressing for progress in the stalled Israeli-Palestinian peace process, met separately in Europe over the weekend with Netanyahu and Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat.

After holding what she called "useful and constructive discussions" with Arafat, Albright returned to Paris for a second, previously unscheduled meeting with Netanyahu.

The Israeli leader convened senior ministers after returning to Israel on Sunday to discuss the principles of a redeployment in the West Bank.

Netanyahu's cabinet approved a conditional redeployment last week, pending Palestinian agreement to begin accelerated final-status talks and to fulfil their commitments under the Oslo accords.

But the cabinet decision did not specify the extent of the redeployment, and a ministerial committee was set up to work out details of the pullback.

U.S. officials warned that they would not work to convince the Palestinians to accept Israel's proposal if the scope of the redeployment is too little.

Under the Interim Agreement, Israel was to carry out three redeployments in the West Bank.

The first phase was rejected in March by the Palestinians because Israel would relinquish about two percent of the West Bank territory. That redeployment was never implemented.

Earlier this year, media reports said Netanyahu was considering a redeployment of about six to eight percent.

The Palestinians have said they expect to assume control over at least 30 percent of the territory in each of the three phases of redeployment.

Arafat, who on Sunday briefed Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak on his talks with Albright, was quoted as saying that he was "encouraged" by the American position and that he believed the United States would demand a "substantial" pullback by Israel.

Mossad agent charged with falsifying reports

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — An agent for Israel's Mossad has been arrested and charged with supplying false information on Syria during the past two decades.

Investigators suspect that Yehuda Gil, 63, also kept as much as $57,000 in funds intended for other sources.

The incident is the latest in a series of recent scandals to shake the Israeli spy service, but it is unclear what impact Gil's information has had on Israeli policy.

Israeli media reported last week that Israel nearly went to war with Syria in the summer of 1996 because of disinformation.

Gil's lawyer, Yigal Shapira, denied that his client intentionally misled the government. But Shapira said in the past three or four years, Gil, who is retired, has been under pressure to provide fresh intelligence information and had recycled material he previously gathered from his source.

Shapira rejected allegations that his client had taken money that was intended for his source.

The Israeli daily Ha'aretz reported that a search of Gil's home found thousands of dollars of Mossad funds and that investigators were looking for another $150,000 that they suspect Gil had kept illegally.

A judge lifted a censorship ban over the weekend to allow the publication of Gil's identity.

The disclosure drew a pointed political reaction. Labor Knesset member Ori Orr, a member of the Knesset subcommittee on the secret services, said the subcommittee would discuss the incident's implications for the intelligence establishment.

The Mossad's image was already battered this year by September's failed assassination attempt on Hamas leader Khaled Mashaal in Jordan.

Histadrut wins as strike ends

By MICHAL YUDELMA AND DAVID HARRIS
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — A general strike that paralyzed the country for five days ended last Sunday night with a clear victory for the Histadrut labor federation, which achieved almost everything it set out to do.

Hundreds of thousands of striking workers began returning to work, after Histadrut chair Amir Peretz and Finance Minister Ya'acov Ne'eman came to an agreement.

The Histadrut's most significant achievement was in forcing the government to consult with it on economic policy.

The way to the agreement was paved when National Labor Court president Steve Adler postponed hearing contempt of court suits and called both sides into his chambers to hammer out a compromise.

The Treasury agreed to rescind plans to tax study funds and promised not to violate pension agreements. The agreement also calls for immediately opening negotiations over wage agreements.

Two issues left for later talks were the transition from budgetary pensions to accumulated pensions, via the pension funds and deciding whether income eligible for pension deductions would be the average wage or twice this sum.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said he was glad that the strike was over. At a reception at the Tel Aviv Museum celebrating the transfer of Bank Hapoalim shares to Ted Arison's group, Netanyahu said he hoped the agreements reached would spare the country unneeded expense, while permitting changes to be made in the pensions system.

Peretz said that "the battle was about whether the workers have a right to be partners, to lift up their heads, to insist on their rights and make demands, or are mere pawns in the game.

"I told Ne'eman we will not have a state of masters and slaves here. If we've achieved that, if we've won, then it's worth any price we've paid," Peretz said.

Peretz said he hoped the Histadrut would be recognized as a full partner on issues such as the state budget, health insurance, child allowances, privatization and structural changes.

"I hope he [Ne'eman] now realizes that his bullying, brutal tactics, which left an entire public feeling humiliated, ignored and despised, were wrong," Peretz said.

"This time, since the agreement was sponsored by the court, I hope it would not occur to Ne'eman to violate it," Peretz added.

He apologized for the hardships the strike caused the public, but said that "a society which wants a recognized and protected workers' class, must accept the temporary suffering."

Peretz said that the Treasury had agreed several months ago to accept the pension agreement signed by former finance minister Avraham Shohat just before the last elections. Ne'eman had argued that the agreement was illegal.

The end of the crisis followed a stormy day of protests in which thousands of angry workers took to the streets, blocking thoroughfares and intersections around the country. Many were angered by reports that Ne'eman was backing down on agreements reached on last Saturday night.

Agreement was reached only in the evening, with an exchange of faxes between Peretz and Ne'eman.

Ne'eman said the agreements could have been reached without a strike, which he said did damage that "was tremendous – to exports, to the tourist industry and the name of the State of Israel."

Neeman also criticized strike leaders and alleged that they did not represent the nation's poor.

"It must be clear Treasury policy is to defend those whose wages are low," he said.

Ne'eman denied allegations that he had sought to break the backbone of the Histadrut.

"The workers need a strong Histadrut, but it must be responsible," he said.

Bronfman reiterates call for billion-dollar settlement

By MARILYN HENRY
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — World Jewish Congress (WJC) President Edgar Bronfman has reiterated his call for a billion-dollar-plus settlement with Switzerland, suggesting it is time to dispense with the "nonsense of great funds and commissions and the committee that's looking into bank accounts."

However, U.S. Undersecretary of State Stuart Eizenstat cautioned that "one should not be dismissive of...historical research."

Bronfman made his call for a settlement in Houston as the international conference in London on Nazi gold was winding down.

By the close of last week's historic meeting of 41 nations, nine states — including Austria and Poland — had made commitments of more than a total of $15 million for a new fund to benefit Holocaust survivors.

That amount fell far short of the $60 million remaining in the coffers of the Tripartite Gold Commission, which was established after World War II to return gold to European states whose reserves had been looted by the Nazis.

Jewish groups had agitated for the so-called "residual gold" to be used for survivors, a position that had the backing of the United States.

"I'm in a bit of a hurry because of the age of the Holocaust survivors. I'd like to get money to them quickly rather than delay, delay, and delay, which of course is what the Swiss have been doing," Bronfman said in Houston.

"Let's just say there's a figure at which point we could just settle the whole damn thing, which includes of course the class action suits in New York," he said, according to a Reuters report.

Three lawsuits, pending in federal court in New York, are seeking at least $20 billion from Swiss banks. Some of the lawyers representing claimants have insisted that the WJC does not have the authority to negotiate a settlement on their behalf.

In Washington and earlier in London, Eizenstat praised the historical commissions, particularly the research of the Bergier Commission in Switzerland.

"I think, in some respects, the most important feature of what's been happening here will be not just the money, but in the long term, the cleansing effect that these national commissions will have," Eizenstat said.

Twelve countries have set up panels to examine their role in the war and their relationship to looted assets.

The Week in Israel

Dec. 1

• According to the Labor and Social Affairs Ministry, about 10 percent, or 240,000 people, of Israel's work force are from outside Israel. The number has almost doubled since 1990.

Dec. 2

• Ashkenazi Chief Rabbi Israel Lau said he supports the rights of Muslims to regain possession of mosques abandoned after the War of Independence and taken over by Israel.

Dec. 3

• A general strike called by the Histadrut involving 700,000 workers effectively paralyzed Israel by shutting down airports, seaports, banks, the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange, government offices and state-owned industries. Despite intensive negotiations Thursday and Friday, the strike had not been settled by week's end.

Dec. 4

• The commission investigating the failed assassination attempt of Hamas leader Khaled Meshal issued a verbal warning to Mossad chief Danny Yatom that he is likely to be harmed by its report, according to media reports.

Dec. 5

• Soldiers have been put on alert against attempts to kidnap them by Hamas terrorists, after members of a Hamas cell captured last week revealed a new method of luring soldiers into cars.

Fifty Years Ago in Palestine

LONDON (Dec. 12) — The British government does not intend to take any part in the implementation of the UN decision on Palestine, either alone or in conjunction with other nations, Foreign Secretary Ernest Bevin today declared in the Commons during the course of the second day of the current two-day debate on the Palestine solution.

PARIS (Dec. 16) — A Jewish state must be created immediately in Palestine "lest anything unforeseen occur" at the next session of the UN General Assembly, scheduled for September, Nahum Goldmann, a member of the Jewish Agency executive, told a gathering of French Zionists.

On Nov. 30, in line with the Olso accords, Israel theoretically agreed to cede more of the West Bank to the Palestinians prior to final status talks. Israel, however, withheld details of the pullback.

Mideast Analysis

What does it all mean? A step closer to a global peace agreement, or simply a ploy by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to buy time and appease his critics?

Whatever the case, the momentum for this moment of truth has been building for months. Last May, the buzz in Jerusalem was that the basis of a final accord with the Palestinians would be the Allon-plus plan, under which Israel would retain at least half the West Bank and virtually all the settlements.

Then, a few weeks ago, the rumor mills were furiously at work again, spewing out unsubstantiated stories that Israel would be prepared to turn over an additional six to eight percent of the West Bank to the Palestine Authority (PA) within five months, provided the Palestinians kept terrorism in check and acquiesced to permanent status negotiations immediately.

The flurry of speculation was triggered by the implicit premise of Oslo — land for the Palestinians in exchange for peace and security for Israel.

Having committed itself to ceding territory to the PA, the previous Israeli government carried out a series of withdrawals to fulfil these promises. Israel gave the PA full control of Area A, comprising three percent of the West Bank, and partial control of Area B, encompassing 24 percent of the West Bank. Israel also pledged to make three additional withdrawals by mid-1998.

Last March, in keeping with these pledges, Netanyahu offered the Palestinians a nine percent withdrawal: seven percent from Area B and two percent from Area C. Expecting a 30 percent withdrawal in the first round, and 90 percent by 1998, the PA rejected the offer as inadequate. The peace process was further buffeted by Israel's unilateral decisions to close Palestinian institutions in East Jerusalem, expand settlements and build a massive Jewish housing project in a disputed district of eastern Jerusalem known as Har Choma.

Denouncing these steps as contrary to the spirit of Oslo, the PA broke off bilateral talks with Israel. The resumption of a new campaign of terrorism by Hamas last March heightened tensions. With the third suicide bombing in September, Netanyahu declared that Israel would not hand over any more territory until the PA cracked down on militant Islamic groups opposed to peace and Israel's existence.

The stalemate was partially broken by U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright. As a direct result of her trip to the region last September, Israel and the PA reopened talks in Washington to resolve secondary issues left over from the 1995 Oslo 2 accord, principally the establishment of a safe passage route from the Gaza Strip to the West Bank and the construction of a seaport and an airport in Gaza.

The Palestinians, however, demanded far more — further pullbacks from the West Bank before the advent of final status talks. Washington concurred, urging Israel to make a "significant" and "credible" withdrawal. The Third Way, one of Netanyahu's coalition partners, called for an initial withdrawal by January 1998. In the face of these pressures, Netanyahu convened his ministers. Late last month, by a 16 to 0 margin (with two abstentions), the cabinet decided in principle to relinquish more land, with the proviso that settlements in the territories be strengthened.

The nebulous announcement, rejected by the PA as deceptive, is fraught with imponderables. Why did ministers normally opposed to withdrawals, vote for the motion? How will Netanyahu mollify radical nationalists who oppose any concessions? What percentage of the West Bank will Israel claim? Can Israel's territorial demands be reconciled with those of the PA? Are Netanyahu's ultimate intentions compatible with peace? These questions have yet to be answered.

Intifada anniversary marked

By MARGOT DUDKEVITCH
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Marking the 10th anniversary since the outbreak of the intifadah, a Hamas spokesperson in Amman last weekend called on Palestinians to keep "the gun directed towards the Zionist enemy."

"Hamas appeals to all Palestinian forces inside the territories and in the Diaspora to unite their ranks in confronting the [Israeli] enemy," said a statement signed by spokesperson Ibrahim Ghosheh.

He also urged Palestinians to "stand firmly against all conspiracies targeting the land of Palestine, all of Palestine, and Jerusalem, all of Jerusalem," and for "eliminating collaborators" with Israel.

In Hebron Saturday, about 500 activists from the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine burned an IDF soldier in effigy and also torched some Israeli and U.S. flags.

Speakers rejected Israel's proposed pullback in the West Bank and called for continued struggle against Israel.

Few Orthodox spokespersons in either Israel or North America have spoken out on the Ne'eman process. "This ad...is significant as an attempt to speak out and to strengthen Ne'eman...Ne'eman is seeking to fend off an irrevocable rift of historical proportions within the Jewish people. The faculty at BIU, which in many ways is the global centre of moderate, centrist Orthodoxy, feels that now is the time to stand up and be counted," Weinberg said.

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl, president of the Conservative Rabbinical Assembly of Ontario, called the ad "a positive statement. We in the Masorti community in Canada and the United States have been working very hard to support the effort of the Ne'eman committee [in a way] that preserves Halachah and provides formal representation and dignity to the Masorti/Conservative and liberal/Reform Judaism."

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz of Tifereth Beth David Jerusalem Synagogue in Montreal, said the ad "is something I could wholeheartedly support."

He said the modern Orthodox wing of Orthodoxy has been "in retreat" in Israel, "afraid of being attacked by the ultra-Orthodox."

The ad indicates a reversal of that trend and it suggests that while the centrist wing of Orthodoxy might disagree with other Jews, it still wishes "to preserve Jewish unity. That's always been the way modern Orthodoxy conducted itself."

Compromises that Ne'eman is considering, such as those on conversions, have been strongly opposed by the ultra-Orthodox, he said.

The ad will probably have little impact on the situation in North America, he added.

Rabbi Dow Murmur of Holy Blossom Temple in Toronto called the ad "an internal Orthodox problem. I think the BIU faculty, representative of modern Orthodoxy, unlike traditional Orthodoxy, supports what Ne'eman is doing"

Austin Beutel, president of the World Union for Progressive Judaism, an umbrella organization for Reform groups, called the ad "positive" in recognizing that Israeli developments have an impact in the Diaspora. But he questioned the ad's last sentence, which suggested a compromise solution must fall within Halachah while providing representation to non-Orthodox groups. It appears to say "we'll allow you formal representation providing you play by our rules," he said. "If you're calling on people to preserve values and have goodwill, why impose conditions?"

Meanwhile, in a move that paralleled the BIU ad, Rabbi Norman Lamm, president of Yeshiva University, came out in support of the compromise being sought by the Ne'eman committee. He urged participants at a recent convention of the World Council of Orthodox Leadership to put compromise and cooperation with the non-Orthodox ahead of theological differences, JTA reported.

"Communal peace is also a principal of Judaism," he said.

Lamm reportedly told 650 listeners they should value and encourage the efforts of non-Orthodox leaders to integrate Jewish practices into the lives of their followers, including the creation of Reform and Conservative day schools.

"I'm very openly attacking the notion that we sometimes find in the Orthodox community that 'being a goy (gentile) is better'" than being a non-Orthodox Jew," he told JTA.

Other speakers criticized the community's intimidation from the right, JTA reported. Rabbi Marc Angel, president of the Rabbinic Alumni of Yeshiva University's Rabbi Isaac Elchanan Theological Seminary, said "there is great danger when authoritarianism comes into play and there are attempts to quash discussion...If the modern Orthodox community doesn't stand up, then who will? If we can't rise above petty sectarian differences, then who will?"

Canada to help track Nazi gold

The McDowall report was well-received and regarded as a model of information-gathering, Charles Spencer of the Bank of Canada told The CJN.

Canada has already received "a number of bilateral inquiries" into how it researched its role in war-era gold transactions, and is ready to share its methods, said Spencer, who managed the bank's gold project.

Other nations at the London conference expressed interest "in the fact that Canada has good access to information. We're ready to supply information to everybody who needs it. Information is what everybody needs at this point."

Canada is now "in a good position" to help other countries probing Nazi loot with "a global reconciliation of gold movements" during the war.

Spencer said Canada established important contacts at the London conference, which should stand it in good stead for the next conference.

The 41 participants agreed to hold another meeting in Washington next year to probe Nazi financial crimes not related to gold, including the plundering of life insurance policies, real estate, securities and art. "Those could be just as difficult and contentious" as the gold issue, Spencer said.

Although Spencer called Canada's role in the global probe of Nazi loot "minor," its records on war-era gold movements "happen to be more complete than [those of] other countries. We're ready to help them reassemble the picture."

What Canada is not ready to do, apparently, is contribute to an international fund, launched by Britain and the United States, to compensate victims of the Nazi regime.

Initial pledges of $15 million (US) have come from nine countries. The donors so far include Austria, which pledged the largest amount, $9 million; Argentina, Brazil, Croatia, Greece, Luxembourg and Poland.

Ottawa "is now considering what the appropriate next step will be," said Rodney Moore, a spokesperson for the Foreign Affairs department.

Women usual caregivers for elderly relatives

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — In families requiring a caregiver for an elderly relative, it is women who take on the role 75 percent of the time, says an associate professor of social work at the University of Toronto.

"Men do provide caregiving, but typically, it is when no women are around. It is unusual for men so we applaud them. Women are taken for granted," Dr. Judith Globerman said at a public health forum sponsored by the Women's Auxiliary of Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

Women employed outside the home, said Globerman, provide as many hours of caregiving as those who are not employed.

Globerman, a lecturer in the area of family care of the elderly, said that caregiving is a complex issue. "There is the objective burden of incontinence, wandering and belligerence. There is also a subjective burden, which relates to the way one experiences giving care – the stress and strain. The experience of the burden is different for different people.

"People may think a certain relative requires very little care, yet the daughter feels a strong subjective burden. How one experiences providing care is as great a predictor of how it will affect them as what they actually do."

The challenge facing families, she said, is to appreciate that there is no one right way to give care.

"We must pay attention to the caregivers' definition of their experience – what they say they need, not what we think they need. We can learn best by listening to others."

One person typically becomes the family caregiver, Globerman said, because "another family member is often described as separate from the others – spoiled, pampered or unable to handle the burden.

"These are old family patterns. In a crisis, adult children usually return to the role they had as a child."

Unencumbered relatives, she said, are those that are not involved in day-to-day care. "Even though not actively caregiving, however, the unencumbered relative does face a subjective burden – emotional strain and worry. They are suffering from the loss of a relative who entitled them to be different. They fear that losing that relative will force them to face change."

Family patterns, she said, play a huge role in deciding about "who does what, when."

Asked about community support for the elderly, Globerman said people need to learn how to access services.

"Baycrest has a program that teaches people how to access other programs. Caregivers need a professional to give them some direction.

"It is unfortunate that we do not have a system in place that is sympathetic to community care. It isn't pretty out there. We must have loud voices and lobby politicians. Closing beds is not helpful or realistic."

Research centre opens

TORONTO — The Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Centre at Mount Sinai Hospital's Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute was officially opened recently at a dedication ceremony honoring Joseph and Wolf Lebovic's $2-million pledge to the centre.

The new research centre will allow Canadian scientists working at the Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute to develop new approaches to understanding the fundamental mechanisms of disease. This research will ultimately lead to improved diagnosis and treatment for such diseases as breast and prostate cancer, heart disease, birth defects, drug addiction and neurodegenerative diseases.

The 20,000-square-foot state-of-the-art facility will also enhance the Canadian biotechnology industry by providing new opportunities for collaborative partnerships with institute scientists.

The $5.1-million project was funded under the Canada/Ontario Infrastructure program. The federal and provincial governments each contributed $1,677,667; the City of Toronto committed $1,054,807; and Metro Toronto covered the balance.

Chanukah Continuity Campaign

As our way of helping to ensure the irreversibility of Jewish continuity, The CJN is launching a special continuity subscription campaign in time for Chanukah. We have decided to offer our readers a special, one-time opportunity to provide their children or their grandchildren with their own subscription to The CJN.

A gift subscription for your child or grandchild, who does not already subscribe to The CJN, will cost $14.95 (taxes included) for one full year to anywhere in Canada.

Over the past few years, The CJN has grown and evolved into an award-winning national community newspaper widely read both here in Canada and abroad. We are extremely proud of this publication. Could there be a better gift at Chanukah for your child or grandchild than the opportunity to feel part of the Jewish community?

Sincerely,

The editor.

Player agents log lots of miles finding athletes

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — As far as Richard Cooper and Andrew Stein are concerned, Jerry Maguire had it easy.

Sure, in the movie the sports agent lost all his clients but one, but that one was a pro football player who earned a very comfortable living. Moreover, Maguire hobnobbed with the big boys and travelled everywhere by plane.

For Cooper, life should be that easy.

Still a relative neophyte in the sports agency business, Cooper earns no air miles visiting clients and he's more likely to have a coffee with a volunteer coach than champagne with a franchise owner. He spends uncounted hours behind the wheel of his car, driving to drafty hockey rinks around southern Ontario, meeting with young prospects and scouting potential new recruits for his growing stable of young hockey players.

It's a reality far removed from the high profile world of NHL player agents like Don Baizley and Larry Kelly and their multi-million-dollar clients like Joe Sakic and Doug Gilmour.

Instead, Cooper Sports Management (CSM) boasts up-and-comers like Nick Smith, Pat Parthenais, Eric Gooldy, Nikos Tselios and Jim Baxter.

Andrew Stein (standing) and Richard Cooper are trying to make names for themselves in the hockey player agency business.

Not yet household names even among hockey aficionados, for Cooper they represent a momentous change in his firm's prospects.

In 1997, all were selected in the NHL entry draft, with Smith leading the way as a third round pick of the Florida Panthers. Altogether, CSM represented five of the 52 Ontario Hockey League (OHL) players who were drafted in '97. Coupled with earlier CSM clients Bill Bowler, Mike Zanutto and Ryan Christie, Cooper can see the day when the sports agency business actually begins to earn the firm some money.

Lawyers by occupation, Cooper and Stein, both 32, consider the sports agency business a sideline, although Cooper devotes 40 percent of his time to it. Together with their partners, Joe Resnick, 31, and Ian Cooper, Richard's brother, they've managed to sign 25 OHL players. Five of their clients are playing in various minor pro leagues.

They did it the hard way, logging thousands of miles and hundreds of hours of travel, sitting in community arenas around the province, watching midget hockey (for 16-year-olds) and even some bantam games (15-year-olds). Ian Cooper, 23, is taking a year off from his work as a business consultant to devote full time to the venture while brother Richard can be found on the road four or five times a week, heading to games in remote corners of Ontario or the United States.

Cooper once drove to North Bay and returning the same night.

Between them, the CSM partners view 20 games a week.

It's necessary if they want to get a firm toehold in the sports agency business, Cooper explained.

Established agents like Kelly and Baizley have players coming to them and most players have agents by the time they play in the OHL. Acknowledging that reality, CSM directed its attention to younger skaters who were overlooked by OHL and NHL scouts.

"When we first started out, it was very difficult. It was a catch 22. No one would go with you if you didn't already have players," Cooper said.

"Whenever we met players or coaches, the first question they'd ask was, who do you have in the NHL?"

Their first signing took place in 1993 when Bill Bowler came on board. One of the OHL's top scorers, Bowler was at 5 foot 8 too small for the NHL. "We befriended him and his father. He wanted someone who'd give his son a lot of time."

The first CSM player drafted by the NHL was Mike Loach, selected by the Islanders in 1994 from Windsor Spitfires. He's now in the East Coast Hockey League.

In '95, Zanutto was chosen in the seventh round by Buffalo. He's playing for their American Hockey League affiliate, Rochester.

In '96, Christie was picked by Dallas from the Owen Sound Platers.

It was a banner year in 1997, as a slew of CSM players were drafted. Perhaps the best of the lot was Tselios, Chris Chelios' cousin and Carolina Hurricane's first pick. He's now playing for Plymouth Whalers (in the Detroit area), a team owned by the Hurricanes' corporate parents, Compuware.

Finding Tselios was a testimony to the CSM doggedness in leaving no stone unturned. Ian Cooper first found Tselios as a midget playing in his hometown of Chicago. Afterwards, "we both went down and saw him play. We couldn't believe how good he was," Richard said.

OHL scouts rated him no better than an eighth round pick, but "we had a lot of confidence in him." We met his family" and helped direct the developing star to the OHL, which they felt suited his style of play. At 6 foot 5, 195 lbs., Tselios "liked the OHL brand of hockey," Cooper said.

They brought Tselios up to the Prospects Tournament that was held in Guelph just before the draft. When he played with other CSM clients, "the OHL scouts were floored by him. They couldn't believe they'd missed him."

Gooldy and Parthenais were similar stories. Gooldy was playing midget hockey in Syracuse, N.Y., when CSM spotted him. Parthenais was playing midget in Rochester, N.Y. and "OHL scouts didn't know he existed." Cooper went down to see him "on a lark" and eventually CSM signed both .

Revealing CSM's recipe for success, Cooper said when you're a small operation, you've got to go that extra mile. Established agents get to work in December when OHL central scouting releases its prospects list, but CSM starts in June, travelling to summer tournaments and exhibition games. "We speak to the players before their heads expand" by getting on the prospects list, Cooper explained.

The Inside Back

Ve'ahavta: Reawakening Jewish commitment

As I was saying...

By RON CSILLAG

There's a lot of history buffeting Avrum Rosensweig. "After the Holocaust, we said, 'Never again,' didn't we?" he asks with a passion that can light a cigarette. "But there's no consciousness of that promise any more. Why are we so worked up about where the rest of the world was during the Holocaust? Where were we?"

Where indeed?

Where were Jews, he asks with a sweep of an arm, during the genocides in Cambodia, Bosnia and Rwanda? Where was the Jewish commitment to ensuring that innocent civilians would never again be butchered because they're the "wrong" ethnicity? Apart from clicking our tongues and declaring what a shame it was just 50 years after Auschwitz, how many of us actually got our hands dirty?

Not that many. For Rosensweig, it seemed that tikkun olam (repair of the world) had sadly become just another moral compass Jews possess.

Rosensweig is 37. He's the son of the late and highly respected Rabbi Phyvle Rosensweig of Kitchener. He's also the jocular co-host of the Marty and Avrum Restaurant and Food Show on Talk 640 radio on Sunday mornings. He wears his hair long, sports cowboy boots and speaks in a refreshingly candid way. There's a Zen-like quality to him.

Now he's on a mission to reawaken Jewish social consciousness, as it affects everyone, not just Jews.

Rosensweig is executive director of the newly-formed Ve'ahavta – the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian Relief Committee. It has no office yet, but it does have a charitable tax number, a board of directors, and a clearly stated goal: to aid those who need aid, no matter where they are, no matter who they are.

It's all designed to restoke the fires of Jewish commitment to the alleviation of suffering. Notably, the name Ve'ahavta, whose root is the verb to love, is taken from the biblical command to love the stranger as yourself.

Rosensweig and president Stephen Epstein envision a three-pronged approach: awareness and education; a "Jewish peace corps" in which medical and other experts would be dispatched the world over to help where they could; and the core, a crisis response team that would address the Rwandas and earthquakes and Bosnias and famines of the world with money, supplies and if need be, bodies.

For its inaugural mission, a team of Jewish doctors, pharmacists and nurses is scheduled to go to Guyana in February to bring medical relief.

Rosensweig's passion was kindled during his seven years at United Jewish Appeal, when he teamed with Canadian Jewish Congress to send funds and donate medicine to Sarajevo, and later to Rwanda. In his efforts, he discovered what he says is "a huge void in the Jewish community."

Not that the community is doing nothing. There's Mazon, a Jewish response to hunger, and several small social action groups. But consider this: there are 40 Metro churches feeding and taking in the homeless in the Out of the Cold program. How many synagogues? One: Holy Blossom Temple, which came aboard just last year after a protracted debate among the membership. How many synagogues participate in Breakfast for Learning, which feeds hot breakfasts to poor kids and tallies a long list of church partners? None.

"I want for Jews to be activists again," Rosensweig says. "Why? Because it's our responsibility. Because we said we would."

Already, he's had people declining involvement because Ve'ahavta doesn't, in a strict sense, serve Jewish needs.

Rosensweig parries: "We're every bit as Jewish as honoring your parents and not sleeping with your neighbor's wife."

It's almost as if the group is throwing down a gauntlet before the community, daring it to back up its credo with something more tangible than a petition or attending a meeting.

"Oh, this will be a huge challenge. We want nothing less than to change the Jewish consciousness," Rosensweig says. "And if you're not prepared to roll up your sleeves, then we don't want you."

Sleeve-rollers are advised to call 416-406-5111.

POTATO & WALNUT FRITTERS

2 large potatoes	1/2 cup chopped walnuts
salt	freshly ground pepper
2 large eggs	5-6 cups vegetable oil, for deep frying

Place cut potatoes in saucepan, cover with water, add salt. Bring to boil, cover and simmer about 25 mins. or until tender. Drain, peel and mash. Mix well with eggs and walnuts and season with salt and pepper to taste.

Heat oil. Test oil by adding a small piece of potato mixture to pan. Oil should bubble energetically. Take round teaspoonful of potato mixture and place in oil. Continue to make more fritters from remaining mixture but do not crowd them in oil. Fry 2-3 mins. or until golden brown on all sides.

Transfer to tray lined with paper towels. Keep warm by placing in 200°F oven. Serve hot. Yield: serves 4.

About Seniors

Dear Jesse,

I am concerned about my uncle's deteriorating health and inability to live on his own. He is a 92-year-old widower, who lost his wife three months ago. His wife was his caregiver. They never had any children. My uncle suffers with severe arthritis and has difficulty walking. He needs a walker. He also has a hearing problem and poor vision. Since his wife's death, my uncle has not been managing well on his own. He has neglected his hygiene; he is not eating and his apartment is dirty. He tends to be repetitious, accuses people of stealing and has become very forgetful. I hired a cleaning lady to clean his apartment, but my uncle refused to allow her in. I also feel that he needs help with his bath. My uncle is resistant to all help offered to him. I would like him to move into a residence.

BJ

Dear BJ,

First, I would like to convey my condolences on your recent loss. I am sure it is difficult for your uncle at this time. It is far too soon after your aunt's death to suggest alternative living arrangements to your uncle. It appears, however, that your uncle would benefit from a geriatric assessment. You can contact his physician to request a referral for an assessment. I would also suggest that you call the local social service agency in his area and ask for a social work assessment to identify his needs. You will see what services they will provide. Homecare programs, bereavement group and volunteer services may be helpful until your uncle is ready to explore a protected environment.

Readers are invited to send any questions they have for Jesse to The CJN. Jesse is the executive director of Jewish Support Services for the Elderly (JSSE) in Montreal.

Sher joins war crimes unit

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canada is looking to its southern neighbor for help in bringing Nazi war criminals to justice. Last week, the federal government announced that Neal Sher, the former director of the U.S. Nazi-hunting Office of Special Investigations (OSI), has joined Canada's war crimes unit to serve as a special consultant.

Sher will bring considerable experience and a proven track record to the job, said Justice Minister Anne McLellan. He is "one of the world's leading experts in dealing with war criminals and its related jurisprudence."

A lawyer in private practice in Washington, D.C., Sher served as head of the OSI from 1983-94 and was with the unit when it was inaugurated in 1979.

McLellan credited him with several accomplishments during his tenure, including prosecuting the OSI's first case, taking deposition evidence in the former Soviet Union and putting Kurt Waldheim on a "watchlist" of undesirables who are ineligible to enter the United Sates.

Sher's retention is a clear signal of the government's commitment to addressing the issue of Nazi war criminals and their modern day counterparts, McLellan said.

McLellan and Defence Minister Art Eggleton announced Sher's appointment at a public news conference at a clubhouse in Earl Bales Park, in the heart of Toronto's Jewish community. Eggleton, who represents the riding of York Centre in Parliament, pointed out that the venue was within site of a Holocaust memorial and a memorial to Swedish diplomat Raoul Wallenberg, who saved thousands of Jews from the Nazis.

Canadians head to Zionist conference

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canada will send 16 delegates to the World Zionist Congress, to be held in Jerusalem Dec. 23 to 27.

That's down from the 21 delegates sent to the last congress in 1992, but the reduction was expected, as the number of representatives from around the world has been cut dramatically.

Originally, Canada was allotted 14 delegates, but the number was raised by two after the World Zionist Organization (WZO) was pressured by the Canadian Zionist Federation (CZF).

The breakdown is as follows:

- United Torah Coalition (Orthodoxy's Zionist arm, comprising Mizrachi and Emunah): four delegates;
- Arza Canada (Reform): three;
- Mercaz Canada (Conservative): three;
- Labor Zionist Coalition (comprising Labor Zionist Alliance of Canada, Na'amat, and Friends of Pioneering Israel): three;

Delegation makeup 'reasonable'

- Herut-Likud Canada: two;
- Zionist Organization of Canada (ZOC): one.

At the 1992 congress, Canadian Orthodox Zionists had five delegates; Reform had four; and Conservatives, three.

Each delegate is entitled to bring at least one alternate.

As expected, the CZF did not hold nationwide elections for delegates, saying they would be costly and potentially divisive.

Viewed on the political/religious spectrum, the Canadian delegates line up six on the left, three in the middle and seven on the right.

Asked whether the makeup of the delegation is fair, CZF president Kurt Rothschild said: "In light of developments, I consider it reasonable. We couldn't do full justice to everybody."

Rothschild will serve as a 17th delegate, but his voting powers will be different than those of the other Canadians.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Toronto Doctor to Speak

TORONTO — Toronto physician William Seidelman will deliver the opening plenary address at a symposium on euthanasia next month in Vienna.

Seidelman, who plans to establish a centre for the study of Nazi medicine at the University of Toronto, will speak on Jan. 29 at the same hospital where hundreds of Austrian children were murdered during the Third Reich's euthanasia program.

Out of the Cold

TORONTO — Volunteers from Toronto's Reconstructionist synagogue, Darchei Noam, have joined forces with St. Peter's Church to take part in the Out of the Cold Program for the homeless.

Some 40 Metro churches and Holy Blossom Temple take part in the program, in which the homeless are provided with a hot meal and a place to sleep for the night.

St. Peter's opens its doors to the homeless Thursday nights.

YLN Donation

TORONTO — The Young Leadership Network (YLN) has issued a challenge to the community to match its donation of $1,000 for the Out of the Cold program.

The YLN of the League for Human Rights is a unit of B'nai Brith Canada.

Nazi Demonstrators

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region chair Moshe Ronen has commended Ontario Attorney General Charles Harnick and Metro Toronto Police for charging eight individuals with willful promotion of hatred.

The charges resulted from the actions of a group of neo-Nazi skinheads who targeted Romani refugees in a demonstration last August.

Ronson Honored

TORONTO — R. Lou Ronson was recently honored by B'nai Brith Canada with the inauguration of the R. Lou Ronson Human Rights Scholarship Fund.

The campaign for the human rights scholarship will culminate in the spring at the annual Media Human Rights Awards.

Fisch Elected York Chair

NEWMARKET — Markham Regional Councillor Bill Fisch has been elected chair of York Regional Council.

At the inaugural meeting of the 1997-2000 regional council, Fisch was elected on the first ballot over Richmond Hill Mayor William Bell and Georgina Mayor Robert Grossi.

Fisch becomes the fifth chair of York Region, succeeding Eldred King, who stepped down this year.

Fish is a lawyer practicing in Thornhill. He and his wife Tova, have two children, David, 23, and Karen, 19.

WORLD

Neo-Nazi Address

FRANKFURT — The revelation that a leading neo-Nazi had given a training lecture to army officers has rocked the German army and forced German officials to scramble to respond.

The German newsmagazine Der Spiegel reported in its most recent issue that neo-Nazi leader Manfred Roeder gave a lecture in 1995 at an army officer's academy in Hamburg.

Corpses Found

BUDAPEST — The remains of 10 corpses found earlier this month in Vienna may have been Hungarian Jews who perished in the Holocaust, according to a Hungarian historian.

The remains, which were believed to be mostly of women and children, indicated that the victims had been shot at close range.

The victims could well have been slave laborers or a small group of people who were trying to make their way back to Hungary near the end of World War II, according to Holocaust historian Szabolcs Szita.

Religious Symbols Removed

NEW YORK — Jewish groups are claiming victory in the latest battle at Auschwitz.

Under orders from the Polish government, eight crosses and 11 Stars of David were removed last week from the grounds of the Nazi death camp.

The religious symbols were placed at the former Nazi death camp in 1983 by a Polish scouting group.

Neo-Nazis Supporters

MOSCOW — Almost half of all fascist sympathizers in Russia are 35 years old or younger and live in large cities.

These were among the findings of the first-ever poll tracking attitudes toward neo-Nazis in Russia, which was conducted by the Public Opinion Foundation, a leading Moscow-based polling firm.

Some 58 percent of Russians have a negative attitude toward neo-Nazi groups, while six percent of respondents have a positive attitude toward such groups, according to the poll.

Thirty-six percent of respondents said they had no definite attitude toward neo-Nazi organizations.

Anti-Semitic Book

MOSCOW — Latvia has agreed to halt distribution of a controversial history book, but human rights activists are questioning the sincerity of the move.

In response to a campaign led by the Washington-based Union of Councils for Soviet Jews and local activists, which had demanded that Janis Karklins' Latvian Eulenspiegel be withdrawn from schools, the Latvian president's office apologized for its distribution.

UN Resolution Withdrawn

NEW YORK — Proponents of the Middle East peace process are breathing a sigh of relief after the withdrawal of an Arab-sponsored UN resolution that would have elevated the status of the Palestinians at the international body.

After a week of diplomatic haggling, the sponsors withdrew their resolution last week, when they realized that they did not have enough support to pass the measure.

The Palestinians currently have observer status at the United Nations. The resolution would have granted them member status without voting privileges.

The United States, Israel, Russia and the European Union all opposed the resolution, fearing that any change in the Palestinian status would have harmed the Middle East peace process.

Former director blasts war crimes unit

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The former head of Canada's war crimes unit is claiming there is a government effort under way to prevent full disclosure of the extent of anti-Jewish prejudice in the unit.

In a news release, Bill Hobson stated "it now appears the government will persist in its coverup tactics for government bureaucrats out of control."

That allegation is part of a wide-ranging and bitter critique by Hobson in which he attacks Canada's record on Nazi war criminals, "political manipulation of the...unit" and of "incompetent management of...senior bureaucrats."

He also suggested that John McCamus, former dean of Osgoode Hall law school, who is investigating allegations of anti-Semitism in the unit, will be hamstrung by an inability to see all relevant documents on the issue.

Hobson told The CJN he was attempting to assist McCamus to view relevant documents but that when he requested to see 304 Justice Department documents that "I know existed, they said they lost two of four boxes containing the documents." In all, only 39 of the 304 documents he requested were given him for his perusal. The missing documents include contemporaneous notes of conversations with senior Justice Department officials in which he recorded allegedly anti-Semitic remarks. Also missing was a record of a conversation with the official's superior who declined to intervene when told by Hobson of the first official's comments.

In recent years, Hobson has become a strident critic of the unit and of the government officials who oversaw its operations. He has suggested the almost total absence of success in bringing war criminals to justice was an indication of the low priority given the task by senior bureaucrats. Bureaucrats and lawyers in the unit focused on hard to win criminal cases when denaturalization and deportation remedies were available, and more likely to be successful, he argues.

He pointed out that one of the unit's few successes came in the Jacob Luitjens deportation case on which he and Arnold Fradkin, his deputy in the unit, served as co-counsel.

Before and after the Luitjens victory, "Fradkin vigorously advocated denaturalization as a remedy" and "he did not accept a 'go slow' or 'do nothing' approach," Hobson said in his news release. "Is it entirely coincidence that he had to leave the unit once Hobson left? And is it entirely coincidence that in the the first five years after Hobson stepped down, no new cases were brought forward?"

Hobson criticized the manner in which McCamus is being given access to documents. He acknowledged McCamus is being given the documents he requests, but he was concerned that in the absence of a complete list of documents, McCamus will not know which ones to ask for. It is the duty of the Justice Department to provide a complete list of all documents, from which McCamus can make his selections, he added.

McCamus told The CJN "I have had absolutely no difficulty getting documents and getting cooperation from [the] Justice [Department]." He said Hobson had cooperated with him in his investigation but he declined to comment on suggestions he might be in the dark as to the documents he should request. He said his confidential report will be completed "sooner rather than later."

Hobson had sought the cooperation of the office of Conflict Resolution and Harassment in the Workplace to facilitate access to relevant documents. But a letter to Hobson from Mathilde Gravelle Bazinet, senior adviser in the office, called Hobson's request for documents "unworkable."

"You are requesting access to entire classes of unknown and unidentified documents," she wrote. "Among others, you request '...all relevant memoranda (documents) exchanged between Yvan Roy, Kim Prost, Julius Isaac, John Tait, Bruce MacFarlane, Peter Kremer, Mr. Rutherford, the right Honorable Kim Campbell, this writer or any of them.' You undoubtedly appreciate the magnitude of the search that this would impose on the staff of the Access to Information and Privacy Office. Moreover the question of whether documents constitute 'memoranda relevant' to the investigation could only be determined by a senior person with an understanding both of the war crimes work and of the nature of this investigation. In our view, this is simply unworkable."

Hobson's coverup allegation did not surprise Sol Littman, Canadian representative of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre. For 40 years, the Justice Department came up with reasons to avoid prosecuting Nazi war criminals. Senior bureaucrats were uninterested in the issue because it had happened to Jews, Littman said.

"I don't have much of a question that the government is approaching this gingerly because of the possibility of embarrassment," he said.

Justice Minister Anne McLellan said "there is no coverup. John McCamus is looking into those allegations [of anti-Semitism]. That was an extraordinary measure in the first place.

"One of the things we wanted with the McCamus review was to get to the bottom of things."

Irving Abella, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress' war crimes committee, said he could not comment on the specifics of Hobson's allegations. "From our perspective, Hobson is a loyal public servant who was one of the more active members of the unit committed to the pursuit of war criminals. We should take everything he says seriously."

John Sims, assistant deputy attorney general responsible for citizenship and immigration matters, declined to comment on Hobson's allegations.

Knives are always a poor education tool

Readers may have been struck as I was, to see on the front page of the Globe and Mail last week, a four-column wide photograph of young Palestinian boys; it was entitled Resistance Remembered.

The resistance that was being remembered by the youngsters in the photo was the 10th anniversary of the intifadah uprising.

The photo focused on three young boys, whose ages I judged to be 3 to 6 years old. They were standing alongside each other in what purported to be a karate exercise of some kind.

The child closest to the photographer bore a quizzical expression; his large dark eyes stared past but not at the camera. His was the only face seen fully in the photo. The faces of both of his two young friends were partially hidden. What was horribly striking about the photo was the fact that each of these young boys was wielding a knife.

They were not small, play knives. Rather, they were large menacing instruments of death. The boy closest to the camera held a hunting knife of some sort with one of its edges serrated. The second boy held a bayonet; the third held a butcher's knife.

The knives appeared to be readied for action, in mid-lunge, as it were, held firmly in the outstretched hands of these small, young arms.

The scene was undoubtedly choreographed and staged for the benefit of the camera. But it was macabre and morbid.

Staring back at the youngsters' dazed expression, I asked myself, what lesson of hate were these very young boys learning? What evil message were they absorbing into the deep parts of their psyches? What malevolent set of values will guide their right-and-wrong as they grow up?

All societies recall their past. Indeed they must, if they are to fashion any sense of collective memory by which to foster social cohesion and a common identity. But what sort of society is it that extols this form of recollection?

What sort of leader places in the hands of its youngest children, with full blessings, the wherewithal of violence and murder, who therefore says, implicitly, that the taking of another's life is not wrong?

What sort of man eventually evolves from this youngster?

The photograph evoked echoes of the comments made by Yasser Arafat 10 years ago, after the intifadah was in full, violent swing, that the Palestinian children themselves, were the stones to be hurled in the battle against Israel.

Ten years later, the children have become adults; and the stones have become knives. The boys who have become men, it seems, have been taught only the harsh, cruel ways of destruction, violence and mayhem.

Through such education, their leaders are effectively dooming the young boys and the men who will grow from them, to a life of hatred, despair, enmity and unfulfilled national aspirations.

Young boys should not be playing with knives. But more importantly, old men should not be putting those knives in little children's hands.

Mr. Fogler is the immediate past Chairman of the Board of Directors of Mount Sinai Hospital and has served as a member of the hospital's Board of Directors for 22 years. Mr. Fogler has been a member of the hospital's Executive Committee for 12 years.

Mr. Fogler is a Senior Partner with Fogler, Rubinoff, Barristers and Solicitors. He currently holds directorship positions with several major Canadian companies including First Marathon Inc., First Mercantile Currency Fund, Goldlist Properties Inc., and MDC Communications Corporation as well as directorships in The Holy Blossom Temple Foundation, The Canadian Society for the Weizman Institute and the Canadian Opera Company.

Now in its 75th year of operation, Mount Sinai Hospital and its Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute provide excellent patient care using a combination of frontier scientific research and leading clinical practitioners. The Mount Sinai Hospital Foundation raises funds and manages endowments to support the scientific and clinical leadership required to meet the Hospital's commitment to deliver the best medicine.

A special birthday celebration

Last week, I had the privilege of attending a special 80th year birthday celebration for a dear friend.

Rachel Kanner is a survivor of the destruction of European Jewry. In spite of that experience, or perhaps more probably, because of it, she lives each day with unique vigor and purpose. On the anvil of her experiences, has been forged a sharp understanding of life's deeper truths.

Rachel invited some of her friends, among whom my wife and I were included, to attend a birthday kiddush at Congregation Darchei Noam, of which she is a member.

It was very moving, but not surprising, to see the love and the warmth with which Rachel was embraced by her fellow congregants.

Branson specialists heading to Humber hospital

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — About 15 specialists at Branson Hospital will join the staff at Humber River Regional Hospital after Branson closes its in-patient beds, said Dr. Lanny Goluboff, Humber's chief of staff.

In the meantime, Goluboff said Humber River, which includes the former York Finch Hospital at Jane Street and Finch Avenue, will do everything possible to keep Branson open, including holding positions for the specialists.

The 496-bed Humber River, operating at three sites, has thus joined North York General in vowing to help Branson overcome its staff shortages.

Although scheduled to close in June, 1999, there is concern that Branson won't be able to operate that long because it is losing staff.

"It's looking that way," Goluboff said about the fear of an early closing by Branson.

"It's important not to destabilize Branson," he said. "For one thing we haven't got the beds right now to accommodate any patients from there."

There is no doubt that Humber River will get more Jewish patients once Branson closes, Goluboff said.

At the moment it only has from two to six Jewish patients on any day according to Jennifer Ferguson speaking for Humber River.

But in anticipation of Branson's closing, Humber River has asked Branson for a copy of its dietary program and visiting hours schedule to accommodate Jewish patients, Ferguson said.

Humber River does bring in kosher meals from Peter Graben Caterers at the request of patients.

The plans for a $55 million redevelopment of Humber River include consideration of a Shabbat elevator.

As well, its staff will be trained in looking after the dietary and other needs of Jewish patients.

Humber River has had the help and advice of Rabbi Ronald Weiss of Jewish Family and Child Service (JF&CS) in serving its Jewish patients, Ferguson said. As well, a volunteer from JF&CS visits Jewish patients every other week.

The York Finch site of Humber River will be a much better looking hospital once the redevelopment is completed, hopefully by the end of 1999, Goluboff said. The same architects who designed the new Princess Margaret Hospital and the addition at Sunnybrook have been retained.

With Branson's emergency department closed at night, Humber River, as the closest hospital, is prepared to take these cases, he said. However, ambulance drivers are generally given direction by dispatchers who take the patient's wishes into account, if there is time.

Although the Hospital Restructuring Commission estimated that 50 percent of Branson patients would go to Humber River, Goluboff thinks it will be less than that.

"Nobody asked the patients where they would go," he said. "Usually they follow their physicians."

He said elderly patients from the Branson area are reluctant to go to Finch and Jane, thinking it unsafe.

"I'm not saying they're right in thinking so, but it's a fact we have to face."

Broadbent defends role of the welfare state

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The success of the welfare state has had the unintended result that workers are being converted to neo-conservatism, Ed Broadbent, former NDP leader, said here recently.

Canadians should resist attacks on the welfare state and call for higher taxes on corporations and the rich, he said in delivering the second annual Louis Lenkinski memorial lecture marking international human rights day.

The lectures honor Lenkinski, trade unionist and Jewish activist, who was described by Moshe Ronen, Ontario region chair of Canadian Jewish Congress, as a man who built bridges between faith communities .

Sponsored by Congress and UJA Federation, the talk drew a warmly appreciative audience at Council House on Bathurst Street.

Introduced by the evening's chair, Rabbi Jordan Pearlson, as a man who tenaciously fought for human rights, Broadbent said that sniping at the welfare state was led by former Premier Margaret Thatcher of Britain and former president Ronald Reagan of the United States.

Reagan promoted the idea that the welfare state was meant only for people who needed welfare, he said.

Now a professor at Simon Fraser University, Vancouver, Broadbent charged that while corporation taxes in Canada have declined from 43 to 33 percent, and income taxes on the wealthy have gone down from 59 to 42 percent, taxes on workers have gone up from 36 to 38 percent.

The welfare state is a marriage between fairness and self-interest "and like all marriages it is risky."

Inequality in the United States has reached record levels, Broadbent said, with the number of millionaires increasing by 500 percent while the incomes of 80 percent remain stagnant.

In Canada, he said, the demand for expensive Mercedes-Benz cars is at all-time high while workers' incomes are lower than a decade ago.

This is one of the reasons why the Liberal government lost seats in the last election, he maintained.

While the welfare state concept faces new problems as the century ends, relating to women's rights for instance, there is no solution to be found in a simple-minded return to the 1960s.

Neo-conservatism has become so powerful a force in Canadian political parties that it must be attacked, Broadbent said.

He was thanked by Joey Steiner, UJA Federation president.

Chanukah to mark start of Israel's anniversary

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — An outdoor candle-lighting ceremony at Queen's Park followed by music and Chanukah treats will kick off a year-long community celebration to mark Israel's 50th birthday.

Toronto will join communities in Israel and in 46 other locations around the world in the official start of the golden anniversary celebrations. The public is invited to attend the event, which begins at 7:30 p.m. on Tuesday, Dec. 23.

Hundreds of children visiting Queen's Park will take centre stage to participate in the Chanukah candle-lighting ceremony as Toronto-area cantors lead a sing along. Participants will then head indoors to the lobby of the legislative building where 50 children and Canadians with special ties to Israel will light 50 chanukiot (holiday candleholders) in honor of Israel's anniversary.

Among those who will light candles are Harold and Linda Kimelman, whose daughter Marnie was killed in a terrorist bombing on a Tel Aviv beach in the summer of 1990. Others to light chanukiot include: Itia Golan, a native of Israel who was honored with a commemorative medal for the 125th anniversary of Canadian confederation for her extensive community involvement; Simcha Jacobovici, an Emmy award-winning documentary filmmaker; Cantor Joseph Cooper, a Holocaust survivor; and Chana Dahab Cohen, a native of Syria who worked to gain the rescue of that country's Jewish community.

"The message of Chanukah and Israel is intertwined — the Jewish spirit can triumph over any obstacle. It's a message reaching out to all nations and all generations," said Donald Carr, co-chair of the event along with his wife, Judy Feld Carr.

"This event is one of the most meaningful possible ways to start Israel at 50 celebrations," said Judy Feld Carr. "I think the people who attend, especially the children, will take home wonderful memories."

In addition to the music and festivities, a draw will take place for a trip to Israel courtesy of El Al Israel Airlines and participants will enjoy latkes and soufganiot (jelly-filled donuts).

The Israel at 50 celebrations are a project of a consortium of hundreds of organizations representing the full spectrum of the Jewish community, said Howard English, a spokesperson for the group. It includes community organizations, membership groups and synagogues.

The Dec. 23 candle-lighting, co-hosted by the Consulate General of Israel, is a kick off of events that will culminate on April 30 when Israel will mark Yom Ha'atzmaut, its Independence Day. More than 10,000 people are expected to attend the Toronto celebration of that event, which will be held at the National Trade Centre at the CNE. It will include an Israeli-style market with food and other products of the Jewish state, music, dance and a multimedia satellite link to Israel.

Other Israel at 50 events include a fashion show at the Yorkdale Shopping Centre in March as well as a community walk for Israel on May 24. In addition, Israel will be showcased at the CNE during "the Ex," from Aug.15 to Sept. 6, English said.

Ethnocultural services safe, says Premier

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Ontario government has no intention of interfering with ethno-specific groups who run seniors' homes and other programs, a coalition of leaders of these communities was assured by Premier Mike Harris.

"The premier said he believed in the integrity of these programs and agreed they should continue to be administered by the ethno-specific groups," said Moshe Ronen, chair, Ontario Region, Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC).

Ronen said the assurances were given in the presence of Community and Social Services Minister Janet Ecker and other senior staff.

Aside from a five percent cut in administration costs, Harris said the government would not be further cutting their funds.

"I have to take at face value what the premier said," Ronen said.

He chaired the coalition's meeting with the premier which was postponed several times.

The dozen coalition members represented the Jewish, Italian, Portuguese, Chinese and Jamaican communities and the United Church, Toronto district. In addition, representatives of the Anglican and Catholic churches, who met earlier in the afternoon with the premier and his senior staff, attended.

Accompanying Ronen were Joey Steiner, president, UJA Federation, and Bernie Farber, acting executive director, Ontario Region, CJC. Rabbi Dow Marmur, senior rabbi, Holy Blossom Temple, sat in on the earlier meeting with the premier.

Ronen said the premier guaranteed that the services would not be forced into mergers with other "generic" organizations as part of social service restructuring and budget cuts.,

"Their integrity will be maintained," he quoted the premier as saying.

Ronen said the premier seemed surprised that any of the groups felt threatened by the government's program, and said that if they had any complaints they should bring them to the attention of the ministry.

Also last week, a coalition of Ontario religious leaders called on Queen's Park to hold a public inquiry into the 1995 shooting death by police of native protester Dudley George at Ipperwash Provincial Park.

Representing the Jewish community was Karen Mock, national director of the League for Human Rights.

Immigrant fraud victim seeks return of money

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — All Arkadi Kogan wants is his money back.

But when you're dealing with a shady Russian company that stole millions of dollars from unsuspecting Jewish emigres, that's not as easy as it sounds.

Kogan is a victim of a fraudulent scheme perpetrated by a company he trusted, a company he says was promoted by the Israeli Embassy in Moscow and by shlichim of the Jewish Agency.

Kogan was cheated out of all his savings, and arrived in Canada two years ago with the little money he was able to salvage.

"I lost everything," says the 46-year-old Toronto computer programmer. "Even $500 I borrowed from my daughter."

And although Israel has offered to compensate victims of the scheme, the money would only go to those who settled in Israel.

Arkadi Kogan and some of his paperwork.

Kogan's nightmare began in his native Moscow in 1994, when he decided to leave, partly because he faced daily doses of anti-Semitism. He wanted to go to Israel to join his mother and the rest of his family, but his wife insisted on settling in Canada.

Like all would-be emigres, Kogan was informed that he would have to open a foreign bank account in order to get his savings out of Russia. He tried to open an account with a Canadian bank, but his Russian bank said he couldn't.

Kogan then asked for and received an invitation to Israel, believing it would be easy to transfer his money from there to Canada.

He visited the Israeli Embassy in Moscow and found advertisements in the waiting room on how to transfer money to the Jewish state. The signs touted a company called Israsov, which sounded to Kogan and others like a joint Israeli-Russian venture.

What's more, Israsov was right across the street from the Israeli Embassy, in the same building as El Al. To Kogan, that lent it additional credibility. The company, he says, also came recommended by various officials, including those from the Jewish Agency.

Israsov even promised to pay interest and had an office in Jerusalem.

So in May 1995, Kogan handed over $60,000 in cash – the proceeds from the sale of his flat – and signed a contract saying the money and the interest would be deposited in the Bank Mizrahi in Jerusalem six months later.

It never was.

By the following spring, Israsov's doors were locked. At its Jerusalem office, at least one victim was compensated with a check drawn on the Bank Hapoalim. The check bounced.

Kogan wasn't the only victim. In Israel, the numbers swelled to 500 families who'd been cheated of a total of $20 million. For many, it was their life savings. The emigres were mainly Russian, but victims were also from Ukraine and Belarus.

The head of the Knesset's immigration and absorption committee, MK Naomi Blumenthal, accused the Israeli government of criminal negligence, saying it must take some responsibility.

Kogan joined a class-action lawsuit against the government. But last April, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu announced the formation of a committee that would decide who is eligible to receive government compensation for 75 percent of the funds lost. In return, the lawsuits would be dropped.

Lawyers for the victims called the decision fair. But the money will only go to those who settled in Israel, leaving Kogan and others in the Diaspora out in the cold.

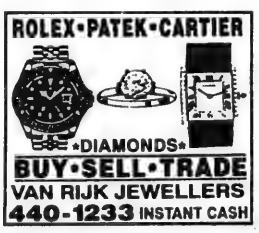
Kogan says there are "at least" 500 other families, in addition to the ones in Israel, who were cheated and who settled in North America.

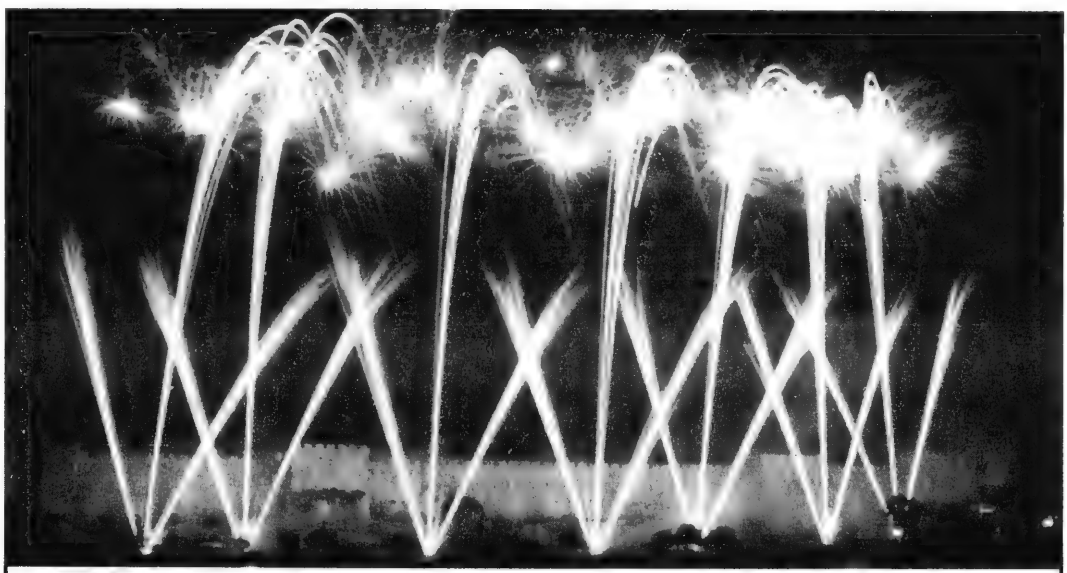
"It was shameful for Israel to act this way," he told The CJN. "I trusted Israel."

Kogan is knee-deep in paperwork. He's mailed letters to Israeli cabinet minister Natan Scharansky, the governor of the Bank of Israel, and even Israeli President Ezer Weizman. All passed the buck to other agencies.

Now, he wants the Israeli Embassy in Ottawa to get involved.

David Sultan, Israel's ambassador to Canada, told The CJN recently that he's aware of the situation, but that nothing can be done for victims outside Israel.





Something to light home about.

This Chanukah, millions of homes will be lighting the way for Israel's 50th anniversary in 1998.
On December 23, the first night of Chanukah, the State of Israel and Jewish communities everywhere, will officially inaugurate 50th birthday festivities. Help us take the miracle of Israel and the miracle of Chanukah to the heart of Toronto, with a spectacular candlelighting ceremony.

Ignored incongruities

The government of Israel is attempting to draw the lines on what it terms its final status "interests map" for the purpose of negotiating peace with the Palestinian Authority (PA). To assist in the effort a special ministerial team comprised of Foreign Minister David Levy, Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai and National Infrastructure Minister Ariel Sharon was established. As of this writing, the team has not been able to find common ground on that map.

But Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu is relying upon the team to develop proposals from which he can present "principles" to both the Americans and the Palestinians. In particular, he was hoping to have those principles in place to present to U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright at their meeting in Paris scheduled for this week.

It is no secret that Albright is expecting Israel to come forward with substantive ideas that, in her mind, will be sufficient to breathe life into the limp Oslo process. She has publicly demanded that both sides live up to their signed commitments. In truth, however she shines the light more hotly on Israel than on the PA.

One commitment in particular whose constant violation we would urge Albright to investigate is the promise by the PA to ensure its educational system "contribute[s] to the peace between the Israeli and Palestinian peoples and to peace in the entire region,"...that it "refrain from the introduction of any motifs that could adversely affect the process of reconciliation." (Article XXII of the Interim Agreement of 1995.)

But like so many articles in the agreements signed with the Palestinians, this one too is being virtually ignored by the PA.

Among the events organized by the PA to commemorate the 10th anniversary of the intifadah, was a martial arts display at which the youngest of the young Palestinian boys was wielding a long knife. Elsewhere in this issue of The CJN (From the editor's desk, page 4), we comment on the profoundly far-reaching implications of such exercises on the children who perform them and on the society that applauds them.

This is, unfortunately, merely one of the myriad incongruities on the part of the PA between its promises under the Interim Agreement and its performance.

Perhaps, as Albright is hectoring the government of Israel to offer up more for the sake of peace, the government of Canada might bring this latest incongruity to the attention of the PA.

Unbecoming Conduct

The government of Ontario finally provided the fiscal details of its controversial offloading scheme. What Premier Mike Harris and his key cabinet officials promised time and again would be "revenue neutral" has in fact turned out to be a $163 million shortfall for the newly amalgamated city of Toronto.

When, in defence of his 2½ million constituents, the mayor-elect Mel Lastman upbraided the premier for lying to the people of Toronto, the premier responded in a manner which is unfortunately becoming his trademark. He threw a slur at Lastman. "Mel is Mel and that's the way he sold refrigerators and furniture."

Whether they are nurses, teachers, civil servants, members of unions, or now, the mayor-elect of the City of Toronto, it appears that the premier of Ontario has a penchant for directing glib, ad personam asperity at people who disagree with him and strongly protest his policies.

A key aspect of the premier's portfolio is to lead by example. But casual, flippant insult is absolutely not the kind of example the people of the province should see and hear from their premier. It is conduct wholly inappropriate and unbecoming to his office.

Jewish family vitality depends on Halachah

Re: "Family, faith, identity" by Rabbi David Hartman (CJN, Nov. 6).

The rate of assimilation and intermarriage in Judaism at all levels is a chilling fact, reflecting a great percentage of Jews unconcerned with their religion. The lack of Torah knowledge in one's life is what leaves room for all the negativism mentioned by Rabbi Hartman. Torah provides the framework of Jewish values with indisputable authenticity.

Rabbi Hartman says that "family and collectivity precede the commitment of faith." The study and practice of Torah has made us into a family. Generations may change, but the constancy of the Torah and family's commitment to Halachah give the family its vitality. The point Rabbi Hartman makes actually presents itself in reverse.

Rabbi Hartman says as a fait accompli, that "having lost Torah as the organizing factor of Jewish consciousness, we must nurture the remaining element of family awareness." How dare we weaken this indispensable feature of continuity?

Who lost Torah? Rabbi Hartman should see that there is more Torah today than we have had in a century, the number of yeshivot and seminaries is exploding across the world. And without Torah, what are we "continuing?"

Finally, what is family about? If family members oppose the tradition of parents and grandparents, then they refuse to understand what family togetherness really means. Family is continuity, with basic respect for its laws and structure. With Torah values in the home, there is continuity and no generation gap.

A message to future generations in Montreal

Plans for the Montreal Jewish Community Campus (CJN, Nov. 13), which is expected to break ground next spring and be completed the following year, include: integrating Cummings House, the Saidye Bronfman Centre and the YM-YWHA Ben Weider Jewish Community Centre through underground and above-ground extensions and matching their exterior facades and landscaped grounds; replacing the old swimming pool at the YM-YWHA with a new Olympic size pool; taking the Holocaust Museum out of the basement and putting it on the ground floor of Cummings House down the hall from a new 400 seat auditorium; as well as many other renovations totalling approximately $23 million.

Just a week after the unveiling of the plans, an article appeared on the front page of La Presse, headlined "Jews prepare for an exodus." It is unfortunate that while the leaders of the Jewish community are trying to instil a vote of confidence in the future of Quebec, the provocative article failed to recognize the efforts of these leaders in preparing for a secure, positive environment that will encourage people to remain in the province.

The complex of buildings represents part of the Jewish community's history, culture and self-perception and therefore reveals to others, as well as ourselves, what it is, in fact, that we value. The people involved in the renovating project are not performing the renovations for themselves, but for future generations of Jewish Montrealers, as well as for the future of the Montreal community as a whole. They are making a leadership statement to us, the many young adults within the community, as well as to our children and our children's children.

I, as well as the entire Montreal community, must remember to recognize the message that we should not abandon the particular character, history and future of the Montreal community.

Improve services instead of building

I, and many people I know, are aghast at the fact that the Jewish community of Montreal is spending millions of dollars on extending existing buildings (CJN, Nov. 13). In essence, they are saying to the separatist Parti Québécois, that, despite its outrageous policies we are prepared to live with the violations of individual rights embedded in its policies and will turn the other cheek.

The reality is that the Montreal Jewish community is aging and shrinking in size, and as long as the separatists are in power, the economy will continue to decline.

All the community's resources are needed for its stated priorities: caring for the poor, strengthening Jewish education and providing services to the aged and youth.

Abraham Joshua Heschel: a remarkable man

By RABBI SOL TANENZAPF

Abraham Heschel, a remarkable personality whose impact on Jewish life in North America was singular, died on Dec. 23, 1972 (18 Tevet, 5733) at the age of 65. This year marks his 25th yahrzeit.

Heschel is known as a scholar, a philosopher, a teacher and a social activist, but I remember him as my Rebbe. I had completed my graduate studies in philosophy at Yale and was teaching at the City University of New York when I enrolled in the Rabbinical School of the Jewish Theological Seminary, where I first met Heschel. I had had a number of truly great teachers as professors; I came to Heschel looking for a spiritual mentor rather than a teacher. Happily, Heschel undertook the job of Rebbe. He taught me that you cannot begin to resolve more immediate problems until you are clear about the direction of your life, about your long-term goals.

Heschel's credentials for the job of Rebbe were impeccable. His grandfather, Abraham Joshua Heschel, after whom he was named, was the Apter Rebbe, the Ohev Yisrael (the one who loved all Jews). On his father's side, he was descended from Rabbi Dov Ber of Mezeritch, the successor to the Ba'al Shem Tov, founder of the chassidic movement. On his mother's side he was a descendant of Rabbi Levi Yitzhak of Berditchev.

Abraham Joshua Heschel

Heschel successfully combined the deep spirituality of Eastern European Chassidism with the culture of modern Western civilization. He received his doctorate in philosophy from the University of Berlin in 1936, three years after he published his first book, a volume of poems in Yiddish, and one year after he wrote a biography of Maimonides. He succeeded Franz Rosenzweig and Martin Buber as director of Freies Judisches Lehrhaus in Frankfort.

In 1938, he was deported to Warsaw by the Nazis, but was rescued from the horrors of the Shoah by the Hebrew Union of College of Cincinnati (HUC), where he taught until 1945. He then accepted an appointment to the faculty of the Jewish Theological Seminary, a post he held for the next 27 years.

At the seminary, Heschel influenced the thinking of a generation of North American rabbis and teachers. However, he did not build up a following or a body of disciples because his methods of philosophizing were uncongenial to North American students. Heschel's methods were those of existential analysis and phenomenological description, methods used by continental thinkers at a time when the dominant schools of philosophy in the English-speaking world were logical empiricism and conceptual analysis. During my six years in rabbinical school, I often found myself in the position of explaining Heschel to his students and explaining his students to Heschel.

Heschel's life as a social activist was filled with controversy. He engaged in interfaith dialogues long before they became fashionable. He was the first Jew appointed to the faculty of the Union Theological Seminary, the most important Protestant theological school in North America. I recall his inaugural lecture at Union Theological Seminary: he introduced himself as His Majesty's Loyal Opposition, and the Protestant clergy insisted on referring to him as Father Abraham. This was in the fall of 1965.

The previous year, Heschel had gone to Rome to consult with Pope Paul VI and Cardinal Bea on drafting the Schema on the Jews, that was later adapted by Vatican II.

Heschel was also one of the first to espouse the cause of Soviet Jews, long before their plight was recognized by Jewish communal leaders in North America.

His work with the Rev. Martin Luther King, Jr. in the early years of the Civil Rights movement, and his anti-war protests during the Vietnamese conflict were widely condemned at the time. I believe that it was his travels around the United States to speak at anti-war rallies that finally destroyed his health and led to his untimely death.

Heschel's vision of Judaism was broad and inclusive, transcending sectarian differences. He never criticized other movements in religious Judaism, even if he disagreed with their theology. After all, it was the leaders of the Reform movement who had rescued him from Poland in 1940. More importantly, he took to heart his grandfather's admonition to be an Ohev Yisrael, to love all Jews.

It has been remarked that Heschel wrote little about the Shoah. Yet, I think that the Shoah influenced everything that Heschel wrote and did. His experiences in Nazi Germany colored his theories of human nature and his explorations into depth psychology. Heschel believed that each person has a dark side to his/her personality and that the discipline of the mitzvot was meant to control the discreditable impulses of the human psyche and to transform human character.

His experiences in Nazi Germany also motivated his social activism. He was determined to act here and now, while there was still time to do something effective, to eradicate social injustices in race relations and to end an immoral war in Vietnam. When the world became aware of the atrocities of the Germans and their confederates, the Nazis were already entrenched and were using terror to consolidate their hold on power. Heschel was determined to act to prevent a similar situation from recurring, a situation where public complacency and indifference would permit evil to flourish.

The social activist and the teacher was also a great scholar and a profound thinker. Heschel made important contributions to diverse scholarly disciplines in several languages. His poetry and his books on the history of the chassidic movement were written in Yiddish and translated into English in his later years and after his death. For Heschel, Yiddish was the language of Chassidism. The Earth is the Lord's (1946), describing the communities of Eastern Europe before they were destroyed during the Shoah, Kotsk: The Struggle for Integrity (1973) and A Passion for Truth (1974) were written in Yiddish.

His first works in biblical scholarship, The Prophets (1936), and in the history of philosophy, Maimonides (1937) and Don Isaac Abrabanel (1937), were written in German. He wrote his three-volume study of talmudic thinking about the concepts of Torah and Revelation (1962-65) in Hebrew; it was recently translated into English as The Theology of Ancient Judaism.

All of Heschel's philosophical works were written in English and these books are the best known to North Americans. Many people are surprised to learn that English was not Heschel's first language or his second language or his third language. He wrote his English books in a lively and felicitous style that is always readable and often lyrical. Since the title of one of his philosophical books was Man's Quest for God (1954) and that of another was God in Search of Man (1955), students at the seminary would refer to Heschel's office on the sixth floor as "the lost and found." Among his other works on philosophy are: The Sabbath (1955), The Insecurity of Freedom (1966), Israel: Echo of Eternity (1969) and Who Is Man? (1971).

Although Heschel's contributions to scholarship in Bible, Talmud, Medieval philosophy and chassidic literature are widely recognized as significant, it is the legacy of his philosophical writings that will have an enduring influence on Jewish life. In his major work, God in Search of Man: a Philosophy of Judaism (1955), he asserts that the religious life of contemporary Jews is without fervor and inner conviction, a form of religious behaviorism. Contemporary persons need to rediscover the paths that lead to an awareness of God's presence in the world and in one's own life. The paths to such awareness are not those of rational argument, but of existential decision-making. Reason, however, can function to clarify the alternatives among which we must choose and to refute incoherent options.

According to Heschel, the first of the three paths is that of reawakened religious emotions, the experiences of wonder and amazement, of awe and reverence. These lead to an awareness of the sublimity and grandeur of natural and human existence, of their mystery and of their allusiveness to an ineffable reality.

The second path to God is through the Torah. God's voice can be heard addressing us in the words of the Torah. The Torah is written, not in descriptive language, but in indicative and evocative language, proclaiming mysteries rather than explaining facts. There is a human element as well as a Divine element in the revelatory experience – the words of Torah are the prophets' own in response to the initiative of God. Most importantly, contemporary persons need to put aside preconceptions and to open themselves to the actual content of the biblical message: that God's omnipotence is restrained, that God needs humans as much as they need to be needed, that without human cooperation the goals of redemption cannot be achieved and that God too experiences emotions. The pathos of God is God's loving concern for creatures, God's suffering together with creatures who are in pain and God's anger at the moral failures of human beings.

The third path to the awareness of the presence of God is through the life of mitzvot, which begins as an experiment in living, as a leap of action. In his rationale for the life of mitzvot, Heschel points out that the mitzvot can evoke experiences of the sublimity, grandeur and mystery of existence. The discipline of the mitzvot can also enable people to control their darker impulses. Finally, through sacred deeds we can become God's proxy in bringing redemption to the world, in ridding the world of violence and oppression.

This legacy is waiting to be reclaimed by a new generation of thinking Jews.

Opinions

Greasy but good

By Viva Press in Halifax

Whether you're religious or secular, Conservative, Reform or Orthodox, it doesn't matter. If you're Ashkenazi or Sephardi, it might make a bit of a difference. Still, you're expected to abide by the customs; so get ready because it's time to eat again!

The holiday of Chanukah is just around the corner and so is the food associated with it.

Jewish holidays require food. Lots of it. Strudel, t'fina, knishes, cholent, kreplach, warka, perogi, kugel, gefilte fish, challah, lockshen... to name a few.

Fortunately, each holiday has its own food. So we don't have to eat everything every time a holiday comes around.

Chanukah got the greasy and fatty stuff. Latkes, soufganiot, bumuelos, chocolate, pancakes, cheese blintzes, grivn, goose.

Put away the diet books, forget the calories and remember, this is a mitzvah.

Chanukah marks the liberation of the Jews from the oppression of the Syrians in the second century BCE. The Syrians captured the Temple and desecrated everything in it, including the jugs of oil the High Priest had prepared for lighting the menorah. In 165 BCE, the Hasmoneans recaptured the Temple from the Syrian army and rebuilt the altar. They found a small jug of oil with which to light the menorah and miraculously, the oil burned for eight days. To commemorate this event, we kindle lights for eight days. Hence Chanukah's other name, the Festival of Lights.

We eat special foods associated with the chag to remember the miracle of the light and the miracle that the outnumbered Jews once again triumphed over their mighty enemy.

Food has own meaning

Each food has its own meaning. Potato latkes, bumuelos, soufganiot and pancakes are eaten because they are fried in oil, which symbolizes the miracle of the jug of oil that lasted for eight days instead of one. Latkes are also called levivot, fasputshes and pontshkes. Jews in both Israel and the Diaspora, Ashkenazi and Sephardi, share in the eating of this food.

The cheese blintzes represent a Jewish victory over the enemy. Cheese is normally associated with Shavuot, but tradition holds that Chanukah is also a cheese holiday. According to legend, Judith, a beautiful widow, fed cheese to Holofernes, an archenemy of the Jews and a Syrian general. Holofernes ate so much cheese that he became extremely thirsty. To quench his thirst, he drank wine and wound up drunk. After Judith beheaded him, the Jews were assured a victory.

I had no idea goose was a traditional Chanukah food until I read the Book of Why. Supposedly, chicken fat and the fat of other fowl was needed to prepare some Chanukah delicacies. It therefore became traditional to serve this fatty fowl on Chanukah to provide its fat. Some of the fat was also used to prepare grivn – fried fat of a fowl served with latkes on Chanukah. For vegetarians like me, apple sauce and cinnamon on latkes tastes just as good – not that I've ever tasted goose fat on my latkes.

And as it is with all meals, dessert is of the utmost importance. If the meal is a dairy one, then chocolate coins are the ideal closure. I'm not sure how far back the custom of playing with the dreidel and gambling with chocolate coins goes. But I do know that it is a great tradition in my family. And the only difference between the dreidel games in Israel and the ones in the Diaspora is the fourth letter on the dreidel. Here it's a "shin," there it's a "pay." We say, "A great miracle happened there." They say, "A great miracle happened here."

Either way, it was a great miracle. Let's celebrate and let's eat.

'Tis the season for final exams

By Justin Korda in Montreal

The most gruelling time of the year for students is now upon us in full force, as the biannual epidemic called "final exams" spreads around the country, forcing students to lock themselves up in their homes or retreat to the packed libraries for cover. Procrastination is another symptom of the exam period, one that I personally associate with very well.

In my last procrastination session, it dawned on me that the final exam period is really a very deep spiritual time saturated with a tremendous amount of religiosity, especially of the Jewish nature.

As we all know, prayer is an intrinsic part of Jewish life. Jews have traditionally prayed three times a day and there are holidays in which additional prayers play a significant part. During exams, the moment I awake in the morning I begin to pray that I have not slept in and missed my exam. In the afternoon I am at it again, praying for all this studying to be over, and at night I pray for a miracle to happen, that despite my lack of studying and abundant procrastination I will still succeed on my exam.

Even those who are adamant about their atheism seem to be talking to someone when they are stumped in the exam room.

During exams, students are divided between those who prepare by memorizing every word of their notes and then regurgitating it all on the exam, and those who feel the need to thoroughly understand all the information so that they can reason through it during their exam. This reminds me of my synagogue. There are those who try to connect with the words in the prayer book and find meaning for their own lives, and then there are those who seem content to listen.

Exams like Jewish holidays

During exam period, the library, which during the rest of the year is a facility in which many students would not be caught dead, becomes one of the coolest hang-outs in town. As thousands of students set up temporary homes in the library for a couple of weeks, much more than studying seems to be going on; it becomes a social scene. This is reminiscent of the synagogue on the High Holy Days. Some people can't wait for the annual Rosh Hashanah fashion show and perfume test-o-thon that takes place in synagogues every year.

Exams are also comparable to some specific Jewish holiday rituals. For instance, on Shavuot we are suppose to stay awake all night studying Torah. This is done because the holiday of Shavuot celebrates the giving of the Torah on Mount Sinai. However, when Moses descended from the mountain with the tablets of the Law in hand, he was confronted by a people who were clearly not ready to receive the Bible, as they indicated by building the golden calf. Therefore, we stay up all night studying the Torah to demonstrate our sorrow for the sins of our ancestors and our eagerness to accept the commandments. During exam period, we also put in frequent all night study sessions. However, these are usually to demonstrate our sorrow for not attending lectures throughout the semester or for not keeping up with the course readings.

Going back to Rosh Hashanah for a minute, we can all recall the Jewish custom of self-evaluation at that point in the year. This looking inward is usually complemented by a series of resolutions concerning characteristics and qualities that we would like to change in the coming year.

This is similar to the feeling you get at four o'clock in the morning in the middle of an "all-nighter" while cramming for an exam at nine. At this point, you are usually promising yourself that this will be the last time you ever do something so ridiculous. Unfortunately, you always somehow end up repeating this resolution a week later when studying for your next exam.

And finally, when exam period is over, you are comforted by a break as a reward. No matter how bleak your exam period looks from the outset, you can always count on there being a light at the end of the tunnel.

Actually, there are eight lights at the end of the tunnel. The eight lights of Chanukah remind us of many miracles that have taken place in the past. Completing exams while maintaining your sanity is definitely one of these.

A Berlin memorial

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Some time ago, in this column, I discussed the cancellation of the planned Holocaust Memorial in Berlin. The award-winning design had called for a cement slab the size of a football field, which was to be elevated at an angle and inscribed with the names of the six million who had perished. From the beginning, that memorial ran into controversy, not only because of its size and design, but also because the whole idea of a memorial was a controversial subject in itself. The debate led a number of people to conclude that Germany, despite all its protestations, had not yet come to terms with its past.

However, even Ignatz Bubis, chair of the Central Council of Jews in Germany, said that the original design with its millions of names would not lift the dead from anonymity. There were other Jews who had lost their dear ones and objected that a public memorial with names written on it would violate the right to the privacy of both the dead and their survivors. These objections, along with those concerning the location, the size and the artistic value of the proposal led to the cancellation of the project – a cancellation supported by the chancellor of Germany himself.

It now seems that those who subsequently predicted that this was the end of any kind of visualization of the Holocaust in Germany's most prominent city have been proven wrong. Plans have gone forward for a new competition and in early November, the minister in charge of the new memorial said that a decision on the winning design for the new memorial would be announced shortly. Thus, the basic idea that Germany should have a central place where the Holocaust would be brought to the attention of every German is alive again and Germany's past is once again being examined.

In this respect, American author Daniel Goldhagen's triumphant tour through Germany was, in many ways, a heartening phenomenon. Goldhagen was the one who wrote Hitler's Willing Executioners, a book in which he argued that Germany had always been primed for not only the expulsion, but also the physical elimination of Jews, and that Hitler merely executed this not so subliminal desire.

It had been generally assumed that when Goldhagen was invited to Germany there would be great opposition. The contrary occurred. He was hailed everywhere in public – a sign that Germans were now ready to face the past and read it as an aberration to which they would never give in again.

This development was underscored recently in another of Germany's prominent cities. In Leipzig, they will at last erect a new memorial to Felix Mendelssohn, the composer who was the grandson of Moses Mendelssohn, the great philosopher of the preceding era. Hitler had ordered the destruction of a monument to the composer because he was of Jewish ancestry – and in fact his music was banned in the Third Reich. This too has now been rectified, another sign that a permanent reversal of Hitler's racial policies vis-a-vis the Jews remains a significant objective 50 years after his death.

The Kirshner File

Russia's Jewish foreign minister is an Arabist

"I consider this a great success of Russian diplomacy recognized by all," boasted Russia's foreign minister, Yevgeny

By Sheldon Kirshner

Primakov last month, after persuading Saddam Hussein to readmit United Nations weapons inspectors to Iraq.

By convincing Iraq to step away from the brink, Primakov not only scored a personal victory, but defused the latest crisis over Iraq's lack of compliance with United Nations resolutions.

It came as no surprise that Primakov, an Arabist on close terms with the leaders of the Arab world, had stuck out his neck to save Iraq from American military retribution. He had tried to do so before, in the run up to the 1991 Gulf War. As one of Mikhail Gorbachev's foreign policy advisors, and as an architect of the Soviet Union's alliance with Iraq, Primakov had gone to Baghdad on three occasions to try to find a face-saving way for Iraq to pull out its troops from Kuwait and thereby pre-empt a U.S. armed attack. These missions had failed.

Given his record as a Soviet and a Russian diplomat, it may come as a surprise that Primakov is Jewish. Known as Yona Finkelstein before he Russified his name, he was born in October 1929 in Kiev, Ukraine. When he was two years old, his father died. His mother married an Armenian doctor, and he spent his childhood in Tbilisi, Georgia.

In the late 1940s, prior to entering the Institute of Oriental Studies in Moscow, he changed his name. His timing was perfect. Josef Stalin had launched an anti-Semitic campaign, and Primakov wanted to fade into the woodwork. Even so, it remains unclear why he was able to rise in the ranks while many of his fellow assimilated Jews fell victim to anti-Semitism.

Throughout the 1950s and 1960s, Primakov — a member of the ruling Communist party — was a reporter and editor. At one point, he was Pravda's Middle East correspondent, based in Cairo.

Primakov Russified his name

During the 1970s and 1980s, he was by turns deputy director of the Institute of World Economy and International Relations and director of the Institute of Oriental Studies. He also held important posts in government as a member of the Communist party's Central Committee, of the Supreme Soviet and, subsequently, of the Politburo, the supreme policy-making body.

In the wake of the Yom Kippur War, when the Soviet Union had no formal relations with Israel, Primakov travelled to Jerusalem in vain attempts to convince two Israeli prime ministers, Yitzhak Rabin and Menachem Begin, to support the reconvening of the Geneva Conference on Middle East peace.

On the eve of his appointment as foreign minister in January 1996, Primakov headed the Foreign Intelligence Service. As foreign minister, he has sought a greater role for Russia — the co-sponsor of the Madrid peace process — in the Middle East. He has strengthened relations with old Soviet allies such as Syria and Iraq and built bridges to Iran and the Palestine Authority.

During a recent tour of the Middle East, Primakov said that Russia would be the first country to recognize a Palestinian state. He blamed Israel for the deadlock in Mideast peace negotiations.

Having served a variety of masters in the Kremlin, Primakov is widely viewed as a political chameleon. Marian Leighton, an American scholar who has studied his career, has observed that he was a centrist under Leonid Brezhnev, a liberal under Gorbachev and a conservative under Yeltsin.

A man for all seasons.

First-time author

At 72, Jacqueline Park, a grandmother, considers herself a first time author. "It feels wonderful," exulted Park, whose novel, The Secret Book of Grazia dei Rossi, was published recently in New York by Simon & Schuster.

The Secret Book of Grazia dei Rossi is about an Italian Jewish woman who is suspended between two cultures. Set during the Renaissance, the novel, which unfolds against the backdrop of religious intolerance, war, papal politics and family strife, was inspired by two letters Park found in a library.

As a professor of dramatic writing at New York University's film school, Park was entitled to free courses. Studying art history, she became fascinated with early Renaissance painting. This, in turn, prompted her to learn Italian and to delve into the chronicles of Italian Jewry.

Reading Shlomo Simonsohn's History of the Jews of Mantua, Park stumbled across an intriguing footnote suggesting a forbidden romance between Pacienza Pontremoli, a Jew, and her Catholic lover. Piqued by curiosity, Park went to the New York Public Library to investigate. There, on microfilm, she found two defunct Italian-Jewish journals which had printed the correspondence between Pontremoli and Isabella D'Este, the daughter of a Catholic aristocrat.

D'Este urged Pontremoli to give up her foolish attachment to Judaism and convert to Christianity so that she could wed the young man who adored her. Pontremoli, weak and confused, wavered.

"At that point," Park said, "the curtain descends and Pacienza disappears into the mists of history."

As this material simmered in her imagination, Park, who lives in Toronto, Miami Beach and New York City, decided it was the stuff of a grand, sweeping novel. Park, who had written a mystery novel in the 1970s based on one of her television scripts, plunged into the task. She finished the manuscript in 10 years. Two more years elapsed before it was finally edited and ready for publication.

Long before embarking on The Secret Book of Grazia dei Rossi, Park, a native of Winnipeg, produced scripts for the National Film Board of Canada and dramas for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. However, she hesitated to attempt an original, fullblown novel. "I didn't have the nerve. It seemed presumptuous of me to tackle that form."

Writing during sabbaticals and vacations, Park learned that the crafting of a novel is a process of self-revelation. "You don't really know what it's all about until you reach the end. A novel has a life of its own."

Remarkably enough, Park's life mirrors this credo. "I never had career plans," she explained. "I went where the wind took me." The daughter of Douglas and Eleanor Rosen, she was an unusually bright student, graduating with an honors BA in economics from the University of Manitoba at the age of 19. Next, she took an MA in economic history at the University of Toronto. "I did it to enlarge my knowledge," said Park, who then was a Marxist.

Leaving Canada in 1960, she immigrated to the United States, where she met her husband, Ben Park, a TV producer with whom she had two daughters. Later, she began teaching at New York University, where she is now a professor emerita.

For Park, The Secret Book of Grazia dei Rossi, coupled with her commitment to promote the book and her intention to write two more Renaissance-era novels, comes at a fortuitous juncture. "My husband died last year, and there was a hole in my life. Now I have a good reason to get up in the morning."

The novel has brought her closer to her Jewish roots. "It took me 60 years really to appreciate that heritage," said Park, who founded a Torah study group while composing The Secret Book of Grazia dei Rossi.

More Unfinished Business* by W. Gunther Plaut (University of Toronto, $35).

At the age of 85, Rabbi Gunther Plaut admits that his golf game is slipping and that his prowess in tennis isn't what it used to be. He is comforted, however, "that for those of us who keep mentally active, there is little loss of acuity, if any, and what we might lose we make up by experience."

This memoir, a companion to his first volume of autobiography, unfolds salient events and issues in his life and work over the last two decades. What is refreshing about this book is the author's willingness to discuss controversial and personal problems with unusual openness and candor.

He deplores the unseemly Jewish religious divisiveness in the Toronto community. Cooperation and understanding have given way to "polarization and even demoralization." The right-wing of Orthodoxy, he asserts, no longer supports the rest of the community, though it expects support from it if needed.

Rabbi Plaut believes that the synagogue, as we have known it, is "facing the battle of its life." In large cities especially, the function of the rabbi will undergo radical change. He will end up as an independent operator prepared to serve the special needs of people on request. "Rabbis and cantors can be hired, like caterers and photographers, on a fee-for-service basis. After all, isn't that the way we relate to our doctors and dentists?"

Pessimistically, he visualizes the synagogue of tomorrow as a moribund institution. "Outside personal crises, prayer is no longer part of the average person's daily or weekly life. Its diminution mirrors waning belief in an operative God, whom we no longer revere as the one who, for instance, "heals the sick" (as the prayer book says) or performs other miracles — functions we now expect from human professionals whom we pay."

Among the 20 or so books that the author has written the Torah Commentary has been, by far, the most successful. By 1995, several hundred thousand copies have been sold. The time involved in research and writing made it necessary for him to resign his position in the Holy Blossom Temple — "the best job any rabbi could have wished for."

In 1996, Rabbi Plaut's Haftorah Commentary was published which deals with the Sabbath readings from the prophets. The material is often difficult and the commentary fills an essential need — especially for bar/bat mitzvah candidates and their families.

The author discloses why and how he wrote his various books, the pleasures and pitfalls of lecturing, his travel experiences in many parts of the world and his reaction in disposing of his cherished library.

There is a delightful chapter about his mother who died just before her 103rd birthday and who was awarded an honorary BA degree by the University of Toronto — the first of its kind ever granted. Other chapters deal with his important work on the Ontario Human Rights Commission and his controversial report dealing with the needs of refugees into Canada.

Once he retired, attending services as a congregant was a new and upsetting experience. "During parts of the service I seem to be on automatic pilot, and I have since found that others in the congregation seem to share my problems...for the first time in my rabbinic life I have learned what I should have known (but never thought about) — that the pew differs vastly from the pulpit."

Rabbi Plaut predicts that during the first half of the 21st century, Judaism will produce the following configuration. "Reform's left-wing will marginalize itself...Reform's right wing will form an alliance with Conservatism's left wing and will become the movement of choice for the largest number of Diaspora Jews. Conservatism's right wing will ally itself with Orthodoxy's vanishing left wing and possibly reinvigorate it thereby."

This book, the summary of a segment of an extraordinary life, inspires the hope that Rabbi Plaut's "business" will continue for many years to come.

Roots & Remembrance

Putting pioneers into print

Reuven Lexier, a Toronto orthopedic surgeon, recently published a handsome 150-page volume that documents his family's experience in Canada from the moment his great-great-grandparents, Shimon and Chana Lechtzier, settled in Winnipeg with their four sons and two daughters in 1882.

The book is called From Kamenets-Podolsk to Winnipeg: The History of the Lechtziers, A Pioneering Canadian Family. Lexier spent about 10 years gathering the 196 photographs, archival documents, newspaper clippings and memorabilia that are reproduced inside. These items lend enormous visual appeal to the work and help give it the flavor of a social history as well as of a family history.

Lexier researched and wrote the text in only two years; in trademark physician's style, he dictated it into a tape recorder for a typist to transcribe. Still, he managed to provide, along with the detailed family charts, a good historical context of the times in which his forebears lived.

He describes the Russian pogroms that propelled family members to Canada; and he elaborates on various aspects of life in Canada – the building of the railway, the whiskey trade, the rise of organized athletics – that affected their lives.

"The very first night that my great-great-grandfather came in 1882, he and his sons were approached to unload rafts of lumber that had been floating down the Winnipeg River, and then they worked for the CPR," Lexier said.

"The CPR gave them special dispensation not to work on Shabbat and Yom Tov.

"They spent the first Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur on the border of Manitoba and Saskatchewan, where they had been laying track for the CPR. They spent $100 to get a sefer Torah and a shofar."

As the author explains, the name Lechtzier comes from two Yiddish words, lecht (candle) and tzier (puller); the name denotes a "candlemaker."

One relative, Rhoda Lechtzier, was the first Jewish girl born in Western Canada to survive beyond infancy. After four other babies in the community died from malnutrition and exposure, Shimon Lechtzier established B'nai Israel, the first Jewish cemetery in the Winnipeg area, in 1882.

Other notable relatives include Sid Halter, who was the first commissioner of the Canadian Football League; George Druxman, who played for the Winnipeg Bluebombers for 10 years and helped the team win five Grey Cups; Sam Lexier, the first Jew to attain the post of worshipful master of a Masonic Lodge (in Regina in the 1930s); and brothers Sam and Saul Lexier, who introduced modern recreational bowling to Canada (in Vancouver in 1927).

Lexier says he took on the project in order to demonstrate the unity of a family that has become increasingly far-flung. Contemporary branches may be found in Ontario and every western province, half a dozen American states and London, England.

"The relatives in Florida, Winnipeg and Yorktown, they don't know each other," he said. "I wanted to unify everybody." He is happy to report that publication of the book has sparked plans for a family reunion, due to take place in Winnipeg next summer.

Lexier's first advice for family historians intent on publishing their research? "One of the main things you should do before undertaking a project like this is to approach your relatives and ask for financial assistance," he said. "I'm not joking. It can be quite costly."

Jewish Life

My Chanukah sites

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Chanukah is almost upon us. Time once again for another instalment of my Top Eight List of reasons to travel the Jewish Highway this Festival of Lights:

Reason No. 1 – The Traditions

Start at Virtual Jerusalem's Chanukah mega-site [http://www.virtual.co.il/city_services/holidays/chanukah/]. There is no single better site to read up on the traditions and all aspects of the holiday. Rabbi Shlomo Riskin presents his observations about the holiday and its customs at [http://virtual.co.il/city_services/holidays/chanukah/riskin.htm] and Rabbi Michael Strassfeld suggests some Chanukah meditations at [http://www.jcn18.com/holiday/hanukkah/strakav.htm].

Sometimes traditions change, not always for the better. Rabbi Cherie Koller-Fox remembers a time when her children would look forward to all the Chanukah traditions. But as the years wore on, her kids became more preoccupied with Chanukah presents than with the rest of the holiday. In Celebrating Chanukah Meaning-fully: Creating Family Memories that Last, she has a few suggestions for making the holiday a family time once again. [http://jewishfamily.com/scripts/newjfl/paper/article.asp?articleid=576].

You can discuss your own observances at [http://jewishfamily.com/scripts/newjfl/forum/forum.asp?ForumID=52&TopicID=2].

Reason No. 2 – The Gelt

Nowadays, the concept of Chanukah "gelt" might mean shopping for the latest cartoon action figure or hottest video game. If you want to be a bit more literal about giving gelt, consider a gift that says something about our heritage. The Israel Government Coins and Medals Corporation [http://www.coins.co.il/] offers a wide assortment of medallions that tell the story of Israel and the Jewish world.

Since we're talking about collecting, philatelists may want to take a look at the first American stamp to recognize a Jewish holiday, the Chanukah stamp [http://www.holidays.net/chanukah/stamp.htm]. Jointly issued with Israel, both countries' stamps feature the same design of a colorful menorah. The American stamp has lettering in English and the Israeli stamp in Hebrew.

Reason No. 3 – The Food

Sure you can get your fill of recipes for latkes [http://www.jcn18.com/holiday/hanukkah/recipe.htm] and soufganiot (jam-filled donuts) [http://www.eskimo.com/~jefffree/recipes/sufgan1.htm] on the Internet.

But isn't this the year to try something different. Naomi Arbit's Chicken Marengo uses chicken, paprika, olives, mushrooms and of course, olive oil [http://www.jewishfamily.com/food-miracle.htm]. You can find mother-watering Frittelli di Chanukah (Chanukah fritters) at [http://godzilla.eecs.berkeley.edu/recipes/ethnic/italian/chanuka-fritters1.html].

There's the wonderful eGGsalad site where you'll find both history and recipes for sweet potato latkes, crepes, roesti potato pancakes and pommes duchesse [http://www.foodwine.com/food/egg/egg1296/eggsalad.html]. Chanukah nut cake with honey syrup is a special holiday cake from Turkish Jewish tradition [http://www.foodstop.com/recipes/nutcake.html]. And for chocolate Chanukah stars, see [http://www.ajlc.waterloo.on.ca/Recipes/Chanukah.html].

Now, I'm not quite sure about the connection between this concoction and the holiday. But you can brew your own Chanukah ale and decide for yourself [http://www.columbia.edu/~peller/ale.html].

Reason No. 4 – The Links

OK, there's no such thing as traditional "Chanukah links." Except if you're still looking for more information on the Internet. Try out Ohr Somayach at [http://www.ohr.org.il/special/chanukah/index.htm] which links to many sites including a page giving eight reasons why Chanukah is celebrated for eight days. The Jewish Communications Network lists several Chanukah sites including four holiday chassidic stories at [http://www.jcn18.com/holiday/hanukkah/]. Also well-worth a look are NerdWorld [http://www.nerdworld.com/cgi-bin/vdata.cgi?5342] and Link L'cha Chanukah [http://www.bethelsudbury.org/linklcha/chanukah.htm].

Next week, the rest of my Top Eight Chanukah List.

One of the best guides I've seen on the subject of genealogical publishing is Patricia Law Hatcher's Producing a Quality Family History (Ancestry, Inc., Salt Lake City, 1996). As a style guide for genealogical publishing, it is a sensible arbiter of such essential questions as the format of dates, genealogical numbering systems and the need for uniform spellings of names that were variously rendered in centuries past.

Hatcher also deals with many technical matters such as page layout, choosing type and fonts, documenting your research, generating an index, and the use and captioning of illustrations, charts and photographs. For family tree researchers who want to self-publish, this book could prove invaluable.

Judy Cohen shows a sterling silver box and a leather-bound prayer book that were buried for safekeeping by her father in Hungary before the Holocaust and retrieved by her brother after the war. They are now part of the exhibit at Baycrest.

Holocaust exhibit at Baycrest

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Photos and memorabilia are on display at a Holocaust exhibit in the Kanner Heritage Museum located on the main floor atrium of Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

The exhibit titled, A Tribute to Courage: Stories of Survival, celebrates the stories of survivors' lives before, during and after the Holocaust. Contributions are from Baycrest clients and people in the community.

Almost half the residents at Baycrest are survivors. The Holocaust exhibit, open to the public until March 15, is a tribute to their will to survive.

"This is the first time an exhibit of this type has been offered at Baycrest," says Pat Dickinson, museum coordinator. "We believe it's the first Holocaust display of this scope to be offered in this kind of Jewish facility, where so many survivors live."

Dickinson says that the exhibit gives visitors, particularly school children, a chance to talk to survivors. "There are lessons to be learned about tolerance, and that what happened has meaning today." She adds that it is a direct link to living history.

An interpretive program with guided tours and an opportunity to speak to elderly survivors who are now Baycrest residents, is available to community and school groups.

The exhibit includes panels of personal accounts from survivors living at Baycrest, videotaped interviews with Baycrest Terrace residents and footage from the annual Yom Hashoah memorial service.

Sculptures, textiles and paintings are from artists including Ernest Raab, Rochelle Rubenstein, Linda Goldman and Toan Klein, whose glass sculpture Listen to the Flame honors 19 members of his family who were killed in the Holocaust.

Judy Cohen, a Holocaust survivor and one of the exhibit's organizers, has lent the exhibit all that remains of her life in Debrecen, Hungary before the war — a sterling silver box, an intricately beaded matzah cover, and a leather-bound prayer book.

"When we were about to be deported to the camp," explains Cohen, "my father put these things in a heavy iron box and buried them in the yard of his scrap iron business. After the war, my brother went back to find them. They are very precious to us."

Sculptures

Cohen's parents, Margit and Sandor Weissenberg were murdered in Auschwitz-Birkenau in 1944. Two sisters died of starvation in the Stutthof concentration camp and two brothers died in the Ukraine as slave laborers. Only Cohen, a brother and a sister survived.

Cohen, who is one of the tour guides, says that the exhibit has a positive side from which people can learn and draw inspiration. "People will see that before the Holocaust we came from thriving communities that enriched the nations in which we lived. That was all destroyed, but out of the ashes we built new lives for ourselves."

Funding for the exhibit has been provided in part by the Landsman Family Foundation and the Conference of Jewish Material Claims Against Germany.

Exhibit hours are Sunday to Thursday, 9 a.m. to 9 p.m. and Fridays, 9 a.m. to 6 p.m. School groups can book tours by calling Mara Swartz, 785-2500, ext. 2275. Community groups can call Pat Dickinson, 785-2500, ext 2802.

Holocaust-themed contest gears up for second year

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — One Holocaust survivor and two children of survivors took it on themselves last year to form an independent non-profit organization and launch an ambitious Holocaust-themed project aimed at high school students.

Motivated by a desire to keep the memory of the Holocaust alive, Jon Kulas Geist and Malka Rosenbaum, both fortysomething children of survivors, joined forces with Eli Pfefferkorn, a Holocaust survivor in his mid-60s, to run a literary/art contest, The Yad B'Yad Expressions of the Holocaust Awards program, for students at Jewish schools across Canada.

This year's contest, for which submissions are due in April, has been expanded to include selected local public high schools that include Holocaust studies as part of the curriculum.

"I think it's important that we reach the [non-Jewish] future leadership of Canada. I hope we can show that Hitler's design was to undermine Western civilization. The Jews were just on the forefront of the annihilation," said Pfefferkorn.

There are three monetary prizes, funded by a Yad B'Yad member, in each of three categories: poetry, art and historical essays.

The core group of three has grown to a committee of about a dozen people of diverse backgrounds, including high school students who will be speaking to other students as part of the program.

In the past year Yad B'Yad has obtained charitable status and funded a play, Virtual Reality, in which six museum sculptures of child Holocaust victims come to life after hours. The script was written by Pfefferkorn – who before moving here in the early 1990s, worked on the Holocaust Memorial Council in Washington – and was performed at Holy Blossom Temple.

Future Yad B'Yad plans include a travelling exhibit and possible publication of winning entries.

The committee was "astounded" at the quality and sensitivity of last year's submissions, said Pfefferkorn, a native of Germany who teaches Jewish History at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto. (He did not judge local entries.)

"I didn't expect such an emotional and intellectual involvement," he said.

Last year's first prize winner in the art works category, Zachor by 15-year-old Zena Pearl of Nepean, took Pfefferkorn's breath away, he said. He was amazed that "a young kid could hold in a frame an entire moment of existence."

"I was curious to know what kids thought about when they thought about the Holocaust," said Kulas Geist, a Canadian-born real estate developer and the father of three young children. Going through the winning entries, "all of a sudden we came to the realization of why we were doing this. We were really emotionally taken."

Rosenbaum, a mother of three and a former high school history teacher, wanted to do more than "just leave [students] with information. We're interested in their response, their thoughts."

Although she has been active in the community in the past, Rosenbaum has avoided Holocaust-related projects because she found them "sort of painful."

An only child who was born in Poland and lived there for her first month, Rosenbaum enjoys Yad B'Yad because it "brings out something new and hope for the future."

Kulas Geist's interest in the project can be attributed in part to the deaths of his parents four years ago and to business travel in Europe, both of which heightened his Jewish identity.

"When you realize the life [survivors] went through and the comfortable life we had, you feel there's something you should do to give something back," he said.

For further information about Yad B'Yad, call 905-940-8345.

The following poem won first prize for poetry in last year's Yad B'Yad competition.

The Waters of Life

A rough day in the dirt sun glinting off our sweat covered faces the dusty game of touch football ends in a tie.

I trudge home lazily dragging my clay covered feet who have never known the dance of the brick maker.

The sweet air of the softly humming air conditioner greets me. My skin cools but the stickiness has not yet left.

And now for the sacred ritual after my long journey the opportunity to change this suit of skin for a more comfortable one.

A shower

The light pitter patter coming from upstairs indicates the use of the shower in the main bathroom.
My last option is the one downstairs.

A queasy uneasiness slowly slithers up my stomach but my filth covered skin gets the best of me and I open the basement door.

The darkness glares in my face and the silence is deafening but I force myself to continue
I am not pushed by the butt of a Nazi gun but by own challenge from within.

I must defy these illogical fears their source has long ago ended never to be repeated.
I am safe
yet I shiver from an unknown draft.

I undress hurriedly and wrap a towel around me embarrassed by my own glaring eyes from the mirror.

My pace slows as I enter the four square brown walls
I shut the door.

The shower feels crowded and I gasp for breath even though I am alone.

I turn the handle and breathe in the lushness smell of the air as the water of life washes over my body.

Variety of kosher restaurants offers community real choice

The kosher scene in Toronto is exciting, partly because new kosher establishments are always opening up and appear to be staying.

This is the final article in our current series on what's new in kashrut in the Greater Toronto Area.

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — I remember the day perfectly.

A recent bride, I was hurrying home, trying to decide what to make for dinner. Then I saw it: Marky's, a tiny restaurant on Bathurst Street, just north of Wilson, had gotten its hechsher.

KASHRUT FRONT

I rushed home, grabbed my equally excited husband, and dashed out for a kosher dinner.

My children howl with laughter when I tell that story, but the fact is, there were so few kosher restaurants at that time that it was a very big deal indeed.

Marky's is still around some 20 years later, now with two locations, one on Wilson, where it moved not too long after its Bathurst Street days, and one in the burgeoning Thornhill community. While it concentrates on deli, its current menu includes salads, grilled poultry, meats and veggies, and some great new desserts.

Fortunately for the kosher consumer, that one restaurant has been joined by over two dozen more, offering Torontonians a selection of kosher eateries that is the envy of many other communities.

Also fortunately, kosher establishments have progressed beyond the attitude that "people will accept whatever we serve because it's kosher," as well as the notion that modern trends in gourmet eating are somehow suspect.

The latest to open is 5th Avenue Eatery, in the Toby and Henry Battle Developmental Centre on Clark Avenue in Thornhill. Victor Alloul, formerly of Vic and Samy's, and head chef Allan Brearley have opened a bright, airy facility that holds 100 people comfortably and offers a limited but decidedly appealing menu.

Breakfasts, which include omelettes, waffles, bagels and cereals, are milchig, while lunch and dinner offer pareve or fleishig selections.

Both lunch and dinner menus include soups made by Brearley, with such intriguing varieties as tomato peanut, lentil rosemary and potato onion; salads and sandwiches; and two entrees, which change every day according to the season, what is fresh in the markets and, one suspects, the operators' imaginations.

Lunches have featured salmon in a phyllo pastry with saffron rice and broccoli, roast turkey with "smashed" potatoes, hamburgers, vegetarian cabbage rolls and oriental beef, while one recent dinner was "maple soaked quarter chicken in a maple, juniper sauce."

One of their specialties is the "muffallata" – pesto and sundried tomato pesto, and grilled red and yellow peppers, eggplant and zucchini on rosemary or tomato focaccia bread.

Desserts for the moment are bakery-bought, but they plan after January to hire a part-time pastry chef.

A patio will be used for outdoor dining in warm weather, complete with patio tables and umbrellas, and a sukkah will be built there on Sukkot.

The restaurant can accommodate parties on-site or can serve as a caterer, and it has a special Chanukah menu. They are planning to kasher the facility for Pesach, and offer a Pesach take-out menu.

Another innovation on the kashrut scene is Ammmazing Donuts, at Bathurst and Wilson. Customers can indulge their passion for cake or yeast donuts with various toppings, including brightly colored sprinkles, chocolate, vanilla, nuts and icing sugar. There are also muffins, soup, gourmet coffee and a few sandwiches.

Gourmet dining not sacrificed

Milk n' Honey is not a new restaurant; in fact, it has been around for 14 years. However, owner Moshe Zombek, after redecorating with Mediterranean murals and country tablecloths, is redoing his menu to emphasize fresh produce, daily and weekly specials, salads and fresh herbs.

Chef Sunil Kant is proud of his antipasto selection, which includes artichoke hearts with mushrooms in a mango dressing; pesto'pasta with feta cheese; braised cabbage with raisins and apples; and shells with smoked salmon and large diced onions in an olive oil and dill dressing. All pastas are organic.

Pasta in green-and-red-pepper sauce, honey mustard salmon, and pizza with grilled vegetables are some of the new offerings.

Zombek promises that old favorites like blintzes and cheesecake will remain on the menu.

Two new pizza places have also opened, Dairy King, next to Ammmazing Donuts, and Yehuda'les, on Bathurst near Chabad Gate in Thornhill.

Besides pizza, Dairy King has a wide selection, including falafel, calzone, egg rolls, vegetarian selections, lasagna, and its specialty, stuffed Moroccan pizza, which is a covered pizza in a special dough, stuffed with sauteed mushrooms, eggplant and other vegetables, and topped with sesame seeds.

Yehuda'les sticks to pizza and falafel, but offers a daily special, which might, for example, top pizzas with zucchini, eggplant or broccoli.

Dairy King and Yehuda'les join many other pizza stores, including Mati's, who adds to his falafel a deep-fried potato chip that is worth the cholesterol; My Zaidy's; Pizza Tova; King David's, which recently opened a new branch in the Sunnybrook Plaza; Tov-Li; and Brooklyn Pizza. All have added extra veggie toppings to their pizzas.

Middle eastern cuisine is featured at Taste of Tikvah and Vic and Samy's, both in Thornhill. Both go beyond hummus to grilled shwarma and shashlik, steaks, chicken and burgers. Vic and Samy's features an add-your-own toppings bar.

Chicken Nest, at Lawrence and Bathurst, and its sister-restaurant Recess, in Thornhill, feature chicken, but also offer ribs, stir-fry, salads and a wide dessert selection.

An interesting development is a selection of four restaurants owned and operated by the same person. Cafe Sheli and Dairy Treats serve a wide selection of dairy entrees, soups, salads and pastries, while Miami Grill is a meat restaurant, combining Chinese, North American and Israeli selections. It is also the only Toronto kosher restaurant that has joined the trend in the general community to have mashed potatoes on the everyday menu. Oasis, at 2 Canadian Place, is a beacon of kosher food in the downtown business area. Selections are generally light, luncheon-type food, and are milchig or pareve.

For a romantic, impression-making or special meal, King Solomon's Table, at Sheppard and Chesswood, offers not only elegant, continental cuisine, but an extensive Chinese buffet.

Another gourmet restaurant, one that has become somewhat of a meeting place, is Spheres, in a strip mall on Centre Street between Bathurst and Dufferin. Although it offers mainly salads, pastas and sandwiches, it is best known for Belgian waffles and gourmet desserts and coffees.

The two branches of Isaac's Bakery have small restaurants attached, offering light dairy meals or the chance to have coffee with one of their own pastries.

Several Second Cup branches now offer kosher baked goods and also serve as places to socialize rather than just to eat.

Kosher food is also available at the Bloor JCC and the Bathurst Jewish Centre, the Baycrest Centre and, if you get there at the right time, Mt. Sinai Hospital.

Apology sought for offensive sermon

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Rev. Paul Melnichuk of Prayer Palace, Toronto, has been asked to apologize on TV, as he already has in a letter, for a sermon termed offensive to the Jewish people.

His Sunday sermon on ONtv (Channel 11) Oct. 26 referred to Judas as a "tight-fisted money changer" and said Jews objected to gentiles being granted salvation.

Though both ONtv and Tom Melnichuk, producer of the program and son of the pastor, have apologized, the Ontario region of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), which initiated the complaint, has asked that the apology also be made on TV.

This is consistent with CJC policy that apologies for offensive material should be repeated in the same medium in which they occurred, said Ellen Cole, the region's community relations chair.

Her complaint said Pastor Melnichuk had incorrectly interpreted scripture in a story based on the Parable of the Inn and that the minister went on to say, "You can just see Judas pulling out his bag of money, peeling off the bills, looking to strike a bargain. Judas was always a cheapskate."

Cole commended ONtv for its quick action in obtaining an apology from Prayer Palace and for promising Congress that it would screen the weekly Sunday programs the previous Friday afternoon to guard against offensive material.

After the complaint was filed, The CJN made several attempts to reach Pastor Melnichuk or his son, Tom, but they did not return messages.

In her letter requesting an on-air apology, Cole said she hoped it would include an invitation to the Jewish community for dialogue in combatting racism and bigotry.

The complaint from Congress to the CRTC said: "In our opinion the pastor went beyond the line of legitimate pastoral licence, indeed crossed the line of intolerance, and engaged in inflammatory rhetoric against Judaism and the Jewish people.

"The construction of Judas as the cheapskate and the sole disciple who attempts to keep the innkeeper way from Jesus is factually incorrect. The perceived Jewish attitude portraying gentiles as dogs who are unable to achieve salvation has no basis in text and particularly runs contrary to the Jewish concept of non-Jews achieving their place in the world to come. For a non-Jew to alight to heaven, one only has to be a decent moral being. Judaism does not damn non-believers. Judaism does not require non-Jews to convert, nor does it term non-Jews as dogs."

In his letter of apology to Ontv, Tom Melnichuk said he had told a representative of Congress that there were Jews in the Prayer Palace congregation and "that our foundation of Christianity is based on the Jewish people and their history, which we endorse, cherish and protect."

The Melnichuks refused to turn over the tape of the Oct. 26 broadcast to Daniel Fine, interim community relations director, but Ontv agreed to let Congress representatives see it.

There were no previous complaints against the Prayer Palace program said Bryan Ellis, executive vice-president and general manager of Niagara Television Limited.

UJA FEDERATION HELPS WIN TAX EXTENSION

UJA Federation is grateful that Ottawa heeded its call for an extension to the 1997 tax deadline for charitable contributions. The decision, which will mean millions of dollars for the needy, allows contributors to receive 1997 tax credits for donations made by January 31, 1998.

Prime Minister Chretien announced the extension on December 4 to help charities recoup lost revenue resulting from the recent postal strike. Had the federal government not responded to the pleas of non-profit organizations, dozens of charities, including UJA Federation and the United Way, stood to lose millions of dollars worth of donations.

Urgent direct pleas from UJA Federation, in partnership with the United Way, for the government to remedy the damage caused by the postal strike was especially strong the day before the announcement. Key UJA Federation volunteers and staff members made direct appeals to MPs and cabinet ministers, including Deputy Prime Minister Herb Gray, to ensure action.

"I'm pleased the government has extended the period for making charitable donations," noted Gray. "This will help many organizations like UJA Federation meet their objectives."

"We started considering requests for an extension the moment they were made," explained Jim Peterson, Secretary of State for International Financial Institutions. "There was an immediate willingness to take this issue right up to the Prime Minister.

Jim Peterson

Herb Gray

Peterson was first informed by the Jewish community about the consequences of the postal strike on UJA Federation's 1997 Ottawa Fly-In, November 26.

The timing of the postal strike was particularly threatening because most charities collect 30-50% of their annual contributions, mostly by mail, in December. "We might have lost close to $3.5 million in payments had the government not responded in time," said UJA Federation's Vice-President of Fundraising, Ted Sokolsky.

Jewish Agency Targets Fifty For Fifty

As Israel celebrates its 50th anniversary in 1998, the UJA Federation funded Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI) forecasts the arrival of another 50,000 Jewish immigrants from the former Soviet Union. The largest proportion of funds allocated to the Jewish Agency from UJA Federation campaigns finances the ongoing exodus of Jews from the region. Here are some surprising statistics about modern Jewish history's largest emigration:

- JAFI brings a new immigrant to Israel from the FSU every 10 minutes.
- Every year, JAFI helps 4.5% of the FSU's remaining Jewish population start new lives in Israel.
- Of the 50,000 Jews expected to make aliya, 21,500 will come from Ukraine and Moldova and 20,000 will be leaving Russia.
- Over 60,000 FSU Jews will enjoy Jewish holiday programs and Israeli events sponsored by JAFI.
- Nearly 25,000 youngsters will participate in youth clubs, seminars, summer camps and counsellor training programs provided by the Jewish Agency.

The Jewish Agency teaches Hebrew to 22,000 young people in the Former Soviet Union, preparing them for aliya.

This year, JAFI will spend over $225 million U.S. on aliya-related activities in the former Soviet Union.

Small Move Big Benefits

UJA Federation's Jewish Information Service (JIS) is not only moving but expanding its outreach.

Although JIS, currently housed in the Lipa Green Building, 4600 Bathurst, is relocating a few steps away in the Bathurst Jewish Centre, JIS Director Joel Verbin says the new address is expected to raise the agency's profile by a mile.

Hundreds of community members visit the Bathurst Jewish Centre everyday.

Verbin hopes to enhance services for new immigrants, especially those coming from the former Soviet Union and Israel, in the new office by inviting Russian and Hebrew speaking community members to volunteer. Anyone interested can call (416) 635-5600.

JIS provides information and referrals on everything from Yiddish language courses to programs for singles. "We can even tell you where to find a mohel to perform a bris," notes Verbin. "We have whatever anyone could possibly want to know about the Jewish community."

Of the 21,000 annual inquiries JIS receives by fax, phone, or in person, the top three deal with housing and accommodation, Jewish day schools and activities for singles.

"Moving to the second floor of the BJC will give us higher visibility and greater accessibility to those who need our help," explains Alan Sandler, Vice-President of Community Planning and Allocations at UJA Federation. Deborah Pinsky, Executive Director of the BJC says she is "thrilled" to welcome JIS to the community centre. "We're looking forward to having this important service on our premises, enabling us to respond in a more timely manner to requests for information."

Telethons Top $400,000

UJA Federation's Days of Decision telethons raised an additional $400,000 for Campaign '98. It was the final push before the Campaign closing December 17. The telethons featured activities for children sponsored by UJA. Dalia Newman displays two of her telethon creations.

MDA program offers unique experience

By BATYA GRUNDLAND
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Last summer, after finishing my second year at York University, I spent two months in Israel in a student volunteer program for Magen David Adom.

Run by the Israel Aliyah Centre, the program sends Canadian university students to work with the ambulance service in Israel.

My participation in Magen David Adom provided me with a unique Israel experience. For the first time, I was not in Israel as a tourist. Instead I was an active volunteer in Israel, living and working among Israelis. As a result, I had the opportunity to experience aspects of Israel that a tourist does not typically see.

There were two sides to the Israel I experienced. The first was the positive, enjoyable side that I experienced when I was spending time with ambulance volunteers and the ambulance drivers, getting to know some Israelis on a personal level.

However, there was also another, more serious side to Israel that I experienced firsthand through the ambulance work.

On the ambulance, I dealt with people of the lower economic echelons who did not have the means to get themselves to the hospital, or lonely elderly people who had no family to assist them as they required. Most sadly of all, I saw troubled young men just out of the army, who, for some reason, could not find a reason to go on living.

This side of Israel is one to which most of us are never exposed. However, as troubling as many of the ambulance experiences were, they did not diminish my love for Israel. In some ways, they may have strengthened it. I came back from Israel with a fairly realistic view of life there, recognizing both positive and negative sides of Israel today.

Yet, in the same way as people's relationships are often strengthened the more they learn about one another and learn to accept all aspects of each other's personalities, my relationship to Israel was enriched as I got a deeper glimpse into more aspects of Israeli life, both good and bad.

Program honors volunteers

TORONTO — Over a dozen university students received certificates and honoraria for their summer volunteer stints with Magen David Adom at a recent ceremony held at the Zionist Centre on Marlee Avenue. The event was co-hosted by Canadian Magen David Adom (CMDA) and the Israel Aliyah Centre.

The volunteer program, limited to 30 students each year, began in Montreal and now includes participants from a few Canadian cities. Among them this year was Herbert Brill, a first-year medical student at the University of Western Ontario, who appreciated the opportunity for hands-on experience.

Aliyah shlichah Miri Gur thanked the students for contributing their "time, effort and heart."

Among the students' more memorable experiences were assisting at a birth, a bombing and the Maccabiah bridge collapse.

"This was a very difficult summer for Israel and for Magen David Adom that had to respond to all those critical emergencies," said Yigal Rosen, vice-president of the CMDA Toronto chapter.

The Toronto chapter was started only two years ago and is purchasing two ambulances for Israel as its current project, said Alan Spector, chapter president.

Campus fair offers high school students taste of university life

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

MARKHAM — High school students got a taste of university Jewish life at the recent Jewish Life on Campus fair.

Representatives from 14 Ontario universities were available to answer questions. Also, seminars were given on such topics as financial aid, Jewish studies programs, doing Jewish on campus and how to survive on campus.

Ilan Meister, York Region coordinator for UJA Federation said the fair was scheduled about three weeks before the application deadlines for university.

"We wanted students to know that there is Jewish life on many campuses across the province.

"The university may not be in a city that has a large Jewish presence, but on campus there is Jewish life. This is a comfort for parents whose children are leaving home."

Meister said that in one seminar students learned that it is never too early to prepare for the workforce. They were told that they would increase their chances of getting a job after graduation if they work part time or do volunteer work while in school.

"We made students aware of the volunteer opportunities available in York Region and told them about the York Region Volunteer Committee."

Among the universities present were the University of Guelph, Queen's University and McMaster University.

A representative from Queen's Hillel told students that an estimated 500 to 600 Jewish students attend the school, which makes up about three percent of the student body.

At McMaster, students can attend Shabbat dinners sponsored by its Jewish Students Association, and take part in social and educational programs. University of Guelph students can be housed with a Jewish family for Shabbat or holidays.

They can also take part in the Guelph Shabbaton, designated as a way of bringing together the Jewish students from small campuses across Ontario.

Meister says another fair is planned for next year, just prior to university application deadlines.

The fair was sponsored by Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, UJA Federation, York Region and Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto.

Crown, police explore reasons behind case failure

By MYRON LOVE
Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The fiasco over the trial last August of four alleged racist skinheads for second degree murder is leading to much finger pointing.

The case against Matt McKay, James Lisik, Robert Welsh and Garry Kuffner collapsed because a key witness who claimed to have been with the accused on the evening of June 30, 1991, when Gordon Kuhtey was beaten to death, was actually living in Vancouver at the time.

The men were arrested in March 1996, and charged with the killing Aug. 18, after a female skinhead talked about the murder at a drinking party in British Columbia.

All four men were alleged to have been connected to the racist and violent Northern Hammerskins and other such groups. They were alleged to have set out that evening to beat up a gay man and picked on Kuhtey because he was walking alone near the Manitoba Legislature in an area reputed to be frequented by gay men.

Although the police claimed to have confessions from Kuffner and Welsh, Judge Nathan Nurgitz ruled that the confessions alone were not enough to sustain a case that was riddled with inconsistencies in addition to the key witness' lack of credibility.

Both Winnipeg Police Chief David Cassels and the Crown Prosecutors Department have conducted reviews of their departments to try to determine what went wrong. Although the police report, released on Nov. 22, concedes that the department ignored contradictions in the case – blaming a lack of manpower in the homicide department at the time.

Cassels believes that the police department's actions were appropriate in recommending a direct indictment rather than a preliminary inquiry, which may have exposed the weaknesses in the case before it went to trial. He blames the botched case on the Crown for not checking the information more thoroughly and the defence attorneys for withholding information.

The Crown Attorney's Office presented the results of its review a week later and came up with much the same story. Manitoba Justice Minister Vic Toews has pronounced himself satisfied with the way the Crown handled the case and also blames the defence attorneys for not informing the police and Crown of the witness' whereabouts at the time of the murder.

In an earlier interview, Saul Simmonds, Lisik's lawyer, suggested that the case collapsed because of the Crown's rush to judgment rather than holding a preliminary inquiry first.

"Direct indictments have been happening with increasing frequency in Manitoba and they should not be," Simmonds said. "A preliminary inquiry tests the credibility of witnesses early on and can pinpoint weaknesses in a prosecution."

Simmonds maintained that the police had enough information in their hands that they should have known the principal witness' claims were inaccurate. His client spent 18 months in custody awaiting trial and is applying to the province for compensation.

Although the murder of Gordon Kuhtey remains unsolved, the witness said she did see four men beating someone up near the banks of the Assiniboine River near where Kuhtey was killed – although she was too drunk and stoned to remember any details – and Kuffner and Welsh did confess to beating up someone in the same location. The police investigation continues and charges could still be laid against all or some of the accused.

UN convention aids kids: Lewis

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The most vulnerable and innocent segment of society, its children, are benefiting the world over from the rare but real power of a particular international convention on children's rights, former United Nations (UN) Canadian ambassador Stephen Lewis said here recently.

Despite the continued exploitation and abuse of children the world over, Lewis said at the recent John P. Humphrey Lectureship in Human Rights at McGill University, the document, passed by the United Nations in 1989 and given binding force in 1990, has impressed Lewis, who described himself as a "healthy skeptic" of international conventions, like no other.

"It is a remarkable document," he told a full house inside the McGill law faculty's Moot Court. "I have been astonished by its impact."

In an eloquent address sprinkled with cutting wit, Lewis, who was introduced by human rights lawyer Irwin Cotler, said the children's convention, whose implementation is monitored worldwide by UNICEF, has proved to be the "most promising and successful" in the UN's history, in part because 191 out of 193 countries have ratified it, except for Somalia and the United States.

Even more important, the document has real teeth and the quality of "indivisibility." For the first time, an international convention recognized the rights to health, economic stability and social justice on the same level as political and civil rights.

"You can't imagine how seriously this is being taken in the developed world," Lewis said. "It has become almost a biblical text. It is being used to change laws and implement public policy, things I would never have thought possible."

The main reason for its success, Lewis said, is because the convention is about children and because it rests on four intellectual pillars: non-discrimination, the child's best interests, the right to survive and develop and the rights of children to be heard.

In the next century, he said, the goal will be to make the convention "as real as possible in each country" that ratified it. "It is not perfect, and the breaches are legion.

"But it is an instrument of human rights law that is making a difference, and it is a faithful mirror on the Universal Declaration of Human Rights" on the eve of its 50th anniversary.

"It will change the lives of hundreds of millions of children."

Cabinet fails to create pullback map

By JAY BUSHINSKY
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu will not be able to show a pullback map to U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright in their planned meeting, nor will he be able to even give her a percentage-figure concerning the scope of the prospective redeployment, government sources said Sunday.

The prospect of a second IDF withdrawal in the West Bank appeared to be tearing the government apart Sunday, as ministers divided at least four ways, and the United States evidently concluding that a quick and definitive decision is not in the cards.

Besides the divergent approaches to the territorial issue expressed by Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai and National Infrastructure Minister Ariel Sharon, the National Religious Party's ministers insist that even the most minimal pullback must be contingent on strict fulfilment of the Palestinian Authority's commitment to root out terrorism.

Foreign Minister David Levy stressed the harm that would be caused to relations with the United States and the European Union if a viable formula for troop redeployment and a concomitant handover of West Bank territory are not delineated and implemented.

U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Martin Indyk, evidently concluded that overt pressure for a cabinet decision that would conform to American specifications might exacerbate the situation, and the Clinton administration should bide its time — until January, if necessary.

Indyk conceded to Netanyahu that Israel evidently needs time to work out the parameters of the projected troop pullback, indicating that this was understandable and acceptable to the United States.

A senior Israeli official said Netanyahu "will be able to tell her which areas can be relinquished and which are vital to Israel's security."

Netanyahu's inability to pinpoint the precise sectors to be evacuated is a direct result of the inconclusive cabinet session on the redeployment issue, during which Mordechai and Sharon were at loggerheads over the amount and location of areas that could be handed over to the PA. It was prompted as well by the cabinet's decision to reconvene and to tour the areas under discussion next week.

Military experts who helped draw the map proposed by Mordechai contended that 500,000 Palestinians will remain under Israeli control if the cabinet adopts the map prepared by Sharon. They also contended that Israel would retain 70 percent of the West Bank. This was described as a potential impediment in future negotiations.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Foreign Minister David Levy confer at this week's cabinet meeting. [RNS/Reuters]

Sharon recommends keeping a 20-kilometre-wide swath of land in the Jordan Valley, while Mordechai wants between 7 km and 10 km. Sharon's plan calls for a 10 to 15-km buffer zone along the Green Line, while Mordechai's measures between 3 km and 6 km.

The Defence Ministry has presented two maps, one outlining security needs and drawn up by the IDF. The other represents "national interests" and includes all settlements, as well as their needs, such as roads and water, government sources said. However, the percentages included in Mordechai's maps are being kept secret.

"Both sides need to make compromises," Mordechai told the cabinet.

In rebuttal, Sharon argued that the dimensions of the security zone delineated by Mordechai are "too narrow" and therefore would not provide the tactical maneuverability required for it to serve its defensive purpose.

His map would leave all the settlements and the mountain aquifer under Israeli jurisdiction.

Sharon maintained that the government must determine which areas should be designated as security zones and therefore cannot be surrendered, noting that this would be in line with the ministers' decision in principle.

Arieh O'Sullivan contributed to this report.

Israel sends message to Pollard

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Signaling a possible policy shift, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has sent a message to jailed spy Jonathan Pollard expressing hope for his imminent release.

The message will be conveyed by Communications Minister Limor Livnat, during a three-day visit to the United States.

Her visit to the federal prison in Butner, N.C., where the former U.S. Navy civilian intelligence analyst is serving a life sentence for spying for Israel, comes several weeks after Absorption Minister Yuli Edelstein became the first Israeli minister to visit Pollard in jail.

Prior to her departure, Livnat said it was time the Israeli government took a more active stand in pressing for Pollard's release.

Last week, the Knesset passed a motion calling for his release.

Insurance firm to pay survivors

By DEIDRE BERGER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

FRANKFURT — A German insurance company has announced that it will settle only a tiny fraction of the 1,800 claims filed by Holocaust victims and their families.

Allianz AG Holding said it will resolve seven insurance claims filed by the victims.

But an Allianz spokesperson made it clear last week that the company does not expect to pay out many more.

The spokesperson said that Allianz was offering about $5,600 to settle each of the seven claims — five from Israel and two from the United States.

Allianz was one of seven European insurers targeted by a $7 billion class-action lawsuit in April that was filed by Holocaust survivors and their families.

The claimants allege they never received payment for policies issued between 1920 and 1945.

The suit alleges that the insurers failed to honor the policies and that in some cases they turned over some of the money to the Nazis.

According to a recently found 1941 letter, the Austrian police ordered several insurance companies to pay to the Nazi government the proceeds of life insurance policies belonging to Holocaust victims.

California's Department of Insurance told the federal judge in the case recently that it wanted to join the plaintiffs on behalf of the survivors living in that state.

Edward Fagan, one of the lawyers representing the plaintiffs, told reporters that he had heard that the states of New York and Florida might also want to join the suit against the insurers.

A New Jersey assemblyman last week called for similar action by his state.

The Allianz spokesperson said last week that after an eight-month search, the Munich-based company has been unable to document hundreds of unpaid insurance claims by Holocaust survivors and their families.

Allianz, the largest insurance company in Europe, maintains that there is only evidence that the seven policies were never paid out.

Since the company set up an international hotline in April to deal with queries on unpaid policies issued before the end of World War II, more than 800 people have called requesting information about 1,800 policies.

Allianz says it forwarded many of the search requests it received on its hotline to other insurance companies.

Kalejs ejected from the U.S.

By JEREMY JONES
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

SYDNEY, Australia — A suspected Latvian war criminal has now been ejected twice from the United States.

Three years after he was originally deported, Konrad Kalejs, 84, was stopped last week at Los Angeles International Airport, where he was planning to transfer to a flight to Mexico, according to Australian news reports.

American officials suspected that after arriving in Mexico, Kalejs was planning to try to re-enter the United States at another border crossing.

But Kalejs, who was on a U.S. immigration watch list, was detained at the airport and placed on a flight back to Australia, where he obtained citizenship after World War II.

The Australian government has placed no restrictions on his travel.

Kalejs is alleged to have been a member of the mobile killing squad known as the Arajs Kommando, or Latvian Auxiliary Security Police, that collaborated with the Nazi SS during World War II. He is accused of having participated in the killing of 20,000 Jews in Latvia.

About 75,000 Jews, or more than 90 percent of Latvia's prewar Jewish community, were murdered by the Nazis — with help from local residents.

Kalejs, who moved to Australia after the war and later relocated to the United States, claims that he was a university student during the war.

He was ordered deported from the United States to Australia in 1994. He subsequently fled to Canada, where he lived for three years.

He was deported by Canada to Australia in August.

Australian officials have said it is unlikely he would be prosecuted there. Latvian officials recently launched an investigation into Kalejs' past, but Jewish officials have accused them of having little desire to bring him to trial.

In a related development, a previously secret memo from the Australian federal police indicated that an investigation of another suspected Latvian war criminal, Karlis Ozols, was dropped for financial reasons, despite the view of investigators that he was probably the most serious war criminal living in Australia.

The Week in Israel

Dec. 8

• Ehud Barak, the head of the Labor party, dissociated himself from remarks made by former party leader Shimon Peres calling for a full Israeli withdrawal from the Golan Heights and for the establishment of a Palestinian state. Barak said Peres' remarks do not represent the party's political platform.

Dec. 9

• Israel beefed up its security in eastern Jerusalem to prevent the Palestinian Authority (PA) from carrying out a census there. Under the terms of the Oslo accords, the Palestinians are not allowed to take a census in the eastern half of the capital. The Knesset passed legislation on Wednesday prohibiting the census.

Dec. 10

• Israel and the PA agreed that four of the nine committees addressing issues outstanding from the 1995 Interim Agreement will resume talks. The issues to be discussed are: security, the Palestinian airport, a safe-passage route between the West Bank and Gaza, and a proposed industrial park.

Dec. 11

• The Knesset passed a motion calling for the release of Jonathan Pollard.

•Israeli media reported that Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Yasser Arafat are slated to meet in London next week.

• Israel's emergency rescue service is training Palestinian paramedics and ambulance drivers.

• A team of Israeli agriculturalists visited Iran recently to teach Iranian farmers agricultural techniques. The Foreign Ministry said the visit was not coordinated with any government official.

Dec. 12

• A senior defence official stated that Israeli fighter jets have carried out 120 training sorties in Turkey this year, many of them practice for long-range missions.

Iraq problem unresolved

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

"This is not over," Samuel Berger, President Bill Clinton's national security advisor, cautioned last month after Saddam Hussein bowed to pressure and readmitted United Nations weapons monitors back into Iraq.

Berger is absolutely correct. The crisis touched off by Iraq in late October, and defused by Russia three weeks later, is far from resolved.

Inspectors, charged with finding and destroying Iraq's biological, chemical and nuclear weapons of mass destruction, have resumed their work to ensure that Iraq fully complies with UN resolutions.

But they do not have access to scores of sites — presidential palaces, factories and research institutes — that Iraq has declared off limits to UN teams.

Iraq, therefore, is flouting international norms again. There is nothing new here. Iraq has been playing a devious game with the UN since the end of the 1991 Gulf War, the so-called "mother of all battles." Iraq's strategy is clear: to rid itself of UN economic sanctions without truly eliminating its stockpile of prohibited weaponry.

Inspectors have destroyed much of Iraq's stocks, far more than were wiped out by American and allied air raids during the war. But by all accounts, Iraq has managed to squirrel away vast quantities of military equipment and toxins it should have surrendered to the UN.

If nothing else, Iraq has been consistent. With each breach of UN resolutions, Iraq has pledged to fulfil its obligations. In 1996, Baghdad promised "immediate, unconditional and unrestricted access" to all sites. And by the terms of Saddam Hussein's recent understanding with Russian Foreign Minister Yevgeny Primakov, Iraq once again agreed to comply with the will of the UN.

But within days of the inspectors' return to Baghdad, Iraq reverted to form. Iraq insisted that only foreign experts, rather than seasoned monitors affiliated with the UN Special Commission (UNSCOM), would be permitted to check sites supposedly containing banned weapons. The UN promptly rejected the offer, as well as a proposal by Russia to declare Iraq free of nuclear weapons and nearly free of ballistic missiles.

Richard Butler, UNSCOM's director, discussed these contentious issues with the Iraqi government in Baghdad late last week, but he achieved very little.

While Butler went about his business, Kofi Annan, the UN secretary-general, began examining the arrangement under which Iraq is allowed to sell limited amounts of oil — $2 billion every six months — to buy food and medicine for its long-suffering population. Russia and France want that sum to be doubled. Annan is expected to submit a report by Jan. 30.

The United States, meanwhile, is building up its air and naval armada in the Persian Gulf, having accused Iraq of continuing to try to deceive weapons inspectors.

A military solution, however, is not necessarily inevitable. Pinprick attacks, carried out by the United States since 1993, have not deterred Iraq from defying the UN and rebuilding its armed forces. And it is highly doubtful whether Washington would commit ground troops to topple the Ba'athist regime in Baghdad. Washington realizes that the grand coalition which prosecuted the Gulf War has all but fallen apart.

The reasons are clear. Iraq is not occupying a country, as it was following its invasion of Kuwait in August 1990. Russia and France, two key players in the diplomatic crisis which culminated with the 1991 war, have strong financial incentives to end the sanctions and normalize relations with Iraq.

Finally, there is a widespread perception in the Arab world, fanned by Baghdad, that Washington is too hard on Iraq and too soft on Israel.This resentment was evident last week. Arab states which boycotted a recent U.S.-sponsored economic conference in Qatar, designed to foster Arab-Israeli cooperation, chose instead to attend an Islamic summit in Iran, which the United States, in vain, has tried to isolate.

Farrakhan arrives in Israel

By JAY BUSHINSKY
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Controversial U.S. black leader Louis Farrakhan caught Israeli officialdom off guard when he showed up last Sunday at the Allenby Bridge to visit both Israel and the Palestinian Authority.

Farrakhan said he hoped to visit al-Aksa Mosque in Jerusalem Monday.

Farrakhan, whose intended visit received mixed responses when it was originally announced earlier this month, was not expected until mid-January.

He was, however, greeted by a PA representative upon his arrival.

Meanwhile, the Foreign Ministry ruled out any meeting between the Nation of Islam leader and Israeli officials, as long as he "adheres to vicious and hateful language against Israel, Judaism, and the Jewish people."

This stand was taken after prolonged consultations about Farrakhan's unexpected entry to the West Bank as a guest of the Palestinian Authority.

About 150 people attended the news conference, including many Holocaust survivors as well as representatives of Jewish community organizations.

McLellan stressed that improving the effectiveness of the war crimes unit was part of policy to instil public confidence in Canada's justice system.

She pointed out that 14 alleged Nazi war criminals have been named in the last three years, more than at any other time. As many as seven of those cases will come before the courts in the next few months, she added.

Sher took up the theme of bringing Nazis to justice, saying "it forces us to deal with the human element of the Holocaust... This is an issue for all Canadians. It is a human rights issue. It's a matter of justice."

Sher, who is Jewish, said "they wouldn't have retained me and I wouldn't have come if both sides weren't serious" about bringing Nazis to justice.

Jewish groups commended the federal government for hiring Sher.

"They could not have made a better choice than Neal Sher," said Irving Abella, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress' war crimes committee. "I think it is a sign that the government does indeed realize that time is running out and they must take whatever measures necessary to bring to justice the perpetrators of heinous crimes committed during World War II."

"We're very encouraged by the appointment of Neal Sher," said Richard Bogoroch, chair of B'nai Brith Canada's war crimes commission. "It is a very important step... We hope it bears fruit. We think that ministers McLellan and Eggleton ought to be commended for helping to bring about a change in attitude to the issue of war crimes."

In other developments, the war crimes unit identified the 13th person to face possible loss of citizenship and deportation for allegedly lying about his wartime activities.

The war crimes unit alleges that Wasyl Odynsky, 73, collaborated with German forces by serving as a guard at labor and concentration camps from 1943 to 1944. They allege he was trained at the Trawniki camp and then served at the Poniatowa labor camp Poland.

Odynsky obtained Canadian citizenship in 1955. Further details of the allegations against Odynsky will be released in mid-January, said Paul Vickery, head of the war crimes unit.

Contacted at their Toronto-area home, a woman who identified herself as Odynsky's wife said her husband was not home. "He has nothing to say to you," she said. "I'm not talking to anybody."

Canadians head to World Zionist Congress

World Zionist Congresses are held every four or five years and bring Zionists to Israel from around the world to hammer out priorities and policies of the WZO.

Some 500 delegates are expected at this month's congress, the 33rd. It will also mark the 100th anniversary of the first congress in Basel.

Traditionally, Israel receives 38 percent of delegates, and the United States 29 percent, with the remainder from the rest of the world.

The WZO shares responsibility for the $500 million annual budget of the powerful Jewish Agency, its organizational partner, with most of that money earmarked for immigrant absorption and education. A sizable portion of those funds comes from North American United Jewish Appeals.

Expected to be a hot-button issue at the congress is religious pluralism and Israel's controversial conversion bill, which would recognize only Orthodox conversions.

Rothschild said he hopes the issue "will not find excessive expression" at the congress.

He defended the absence of elections in Canada, saying the selection of delegates was handled "in a friendly and dignified manner, without confrontation."

In the United States, the election of 145 delegates to the congress was at times nasty, with those on the left and right trading public barbs.

ABOUT NUTRITION

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. I often eat a bagel at lunch or breakfast and I feel comfortable with this low fat choice. Is it an acceptable choice?

A. Bagels are a low fat choice. However, many bagels are quite dense and can have as many as 300 to 500 calories, even more in the large twisters. Thus, while bagels are low in fat, they can still pack in a hefty amount of calories. I would also suggest that you try to include a source or protein along with the bagels at meals.

Q. I love olives and eat them frequently. I was very upset recently when I was told that olives may be high in fat and calories. Can you please give me the facts?

A. Here is some reassuring news for you and many other olive lovers. Olives are not high in calories – one large olive contains approximately five calories. Olives are, however, higher in fat than most vegetables at 0.5 grams of fat per one large olive. Therefore eating a lot of olives can add up in the fat department.

Q. I am three months pregnant and am finding it very difficult to consume all the dairy products recommended during pregnancy. Do you have any advice?

A. I have fabulous news for you. New research about calcium in pregnancy reveals that we do not require additional calcium during either pregnancy or lactation. We need only consume the age-appropriate recommendation for calcium. Calcium recommendations for Canadians have recently been revised to reflect this important new finding. You can also benefit from calcium in non-dairy foods such as sardines, almonds, canned salmon with bones, bok choy (kale), canned baked beans or cooked soya beans.

Specific gene may hold key to controlling malignant cancer

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A gene being studied by a scientist supported by the Toronto-based Marnie Kimelman Research Fund may hold the key to preventing cancer cells from becoming malignant.

Dr. Isaac Witz, professor of immunology at Tel Aviv University, speaking at a meeting of Canadian Friends of Tel Aviv University, said that he wanted Marnie's parents, Harold and Linda, to know that their memorialization of their daughter had borne fruit.

(Marnie was killed by a terrorist bomb on a beach in Tel Aviv in 1990. The research fund is one of the projects her parents instituted in her memory. Others include the renovation of the Teen Lounge at the Hospital for Sick Children.)

Witz explained that Rinat Eshal, the Marnie Kimelman Fellow, is working on a protein called E48, which appears to reduce the likelihood that head and neck cancer cells will become malignant.

The research is focusing on what makes a cancerous cell begin to divide and attack other cells in the body. Research in the past has focused on the cell as a single, isolated entity, Witz said, but now, he said, the focus of research is on the interaction between the cancer cells, the immune system of the patient, and the environment both within and outside of the body.

In the mid 1970s, he said, a protein called LY 6 was discovered, that later was found to suppress the ability of cancer cells to proliferate.

"It appeared to have something to do with stopping the body from producing a blood supply that would nourish cancer cells," he said.

In collaboration with a Dutch group of scientists, Witz said, Eshel is studying E48, a cloned version of the LY 6 protein.

"The study has shown that head and neck squamous (cancerous) cells with more E48, are less malignant than those with less of it."

Thus, he said, speaking with great caution, "it appears that E48 is a good gene for a person to have – maybe."

E48 seems to have something to do with how cells communicate, Witz said, which is the aspect that Eshel is studying, "doing experiments to separate cells in which E48 proteins have been stimulated [as opposed to] cells in which it has not been."

If the people studying it can prove that E48 is an anti-cancer gene, Witz suggested that they will try to figure out how it works, and how it acts with (or does not act with) other genes that retard the progression and cause the death of tumor cells.

The hope is, he said, "to prevent or at least slow the process that takes local cancer cells and makes them malignant."

He stressed during the question period that "E48 may be the solution for cancer of the head and neck, but not necessarily [a cure for cancer in general]."

Tamara Podemski: Rent

Rez actor tackles the theatre

BY ADAM BELLO
Special to the CJN

Tamara Podemski

TORONTO — A North York movie and television actor of Israeli and Native Canadian heritage is now stretching her abilities before theatrical audiences in the much anticipated local production of Rent.

"I saw Rent on the Tony Awards two years ago and I was instantly mesmerized," says Tamara Podemski, 20. "When it was announced [a year and a half later] that the play was coming to Toronto, it just seemed too out of this world and I went right away to book an audition."

Facing the transition to live performance was, she says, "the most physically demanding job I have ever had."

The graduate of the Claude Watson School for the Performing Arts has brought her talents to Canadian film with a pivotal role in Bruce MacDonald's 1993 Dance Me Outside, and is currently starring as the aspiring actress, Lucy, in the CBC comedy-drama series, The Rez.

Podemski plays several roles in Jonathan Larson's modern reworking of Puccini's La Bohème, notably Mrs. Cohen, the Jewish mother of Mark, Rent's lead (Chad Richardson).

Performing without makeup or costume to make her look older adds to the humor of the interpretation, Podemski says.

"I think I'm the only one in the cast that could understand the role," she says. "I used every Jewish mother I knew as a model to play this 45 year-old New Yorker. What I found was this consistent level of caring and checking up that all these mothers do with their children."

Her other roles in the production include a homeless person, a junkie and Pam, a character with AIDS.

While Podemski was one of the first cast members chosen from the roughly 6,000 who auditioned for the Royal Alexandra Theatre's production of Rent, the YTV Award-nominated actress says her destiny could have taken another path.

She said going to the rock musical's initial casting call in February meant some soul searching…and a boost of confidence.

"The morning of the first auditions, I almost had a change of heart. It just seemed too far fetched that I would be involved," she says. "Before Rent, I had auditioned for every musical theatre show that has come to Toronto – which became a very humbling lesson in how hard it is to get into the profession.

"But my father knew how much being in the play meant to me and gave me the encouragement not to give up, that nudge of positive reinforcement I could do it."

The level of family support and shared experience found among the Podemskis (sister Jennifer is a fellow Rez co-star) come with a multicultural outlook. Integrating her father's background of K'far Saba, Israel, with her mother's of the Prairies-based Ojibway nation of Saulteaux, Podemski has kept herself tied to both.

"The great thing about playing on The Rez is the entertaining way it allows us to educate the audience about living on an Indian reserve," she says.

"We do it without stressing the political issues, but still focus on the different aspects of the young characters' lives."

While theatrical experiences in the Jewish community have played a less active role in her career (a year of jazz performance at the Bathurst Jewish Centre), growing up with a strong sense of Israeli nationalism has remained a matter close to Podemski's heart.

Many of her summers were spent at the Zionist camp Hashomer Hatzair, where she was given an early artistic outlet.

The sense of Zionistic pride has also motivated her to visit Israel on six separate occasions. As an alternative to the formal ceremony for her bat mitzvah and official conversion to Judaism, Podemski was sent on her 12th birthday to explore the country by herself. She says she eventually plans to settle in Israel permanently.

"One of my long term goals is to start a theatrical arts school in Israel for children," Podemski says. "The arts are the greatest healing power we have in this world and I don't think Israel has developed the abundance of programs that we have in North America. Their artistic community is still evolving and I think it is a great opportunity to pursue."

Bagels All The Way:

Talent show a chance for kids to shine

By CINDY WAXER
Special to the CJN

TORONTO — At this time of year, there are many children for whom the jingle bells do not ring.

For this reason, writer/comedian/producer Michael Gelbart and law student Lisa Fefer are producing Bagels All The Way, a holiday season showcase featuring the talented youth of Toronto.

"During the Christmas season… there's not much to do for people of different ethnic backgrounds and minorities and we felt that putting together a talent show for children is a way to make them feel more part of the holiday season," says Gelbart.

To be held at the York Woods Library Theatre on Dec. 30, Bagels All The Way will feature young people, age 6 to 15, performing songs, dances and comedy sketches on both an individual and a group basis.

But unlike some nerve-racking talent competitions, the event will provide an informal and non-threatening environment for young people who simply wish to perform in front of a live audience.

"I'm getting my agent to come, as well as other agents, just to look at the kids, but really, I don't want anyone going in thinking they're going to come out a star, because it's mostly about having fun," says Gelbart who regularly headlines at Yuk Yuk's comedy clubs.

And Bagels All The Way is more than simply an opportunity for children to bring their shtick to the brightly-lit stage.

"[Performing on stage] builds children's self-confidence and gives them an opportunity to feel really good about themselves and shine and express themselves creatively," says Fefer who, prior to her pursuit of a law degree, received numerous prestigious awards as a pianist.

Yet despite both Gelbart and Fefer's on-stage expertise, their criteria for selecting participants is based more on a student's desire to participate than on a background in the performing arts.

Although enthusiasm, originality and a healthy attitude are prerequisites, all children are welcome to participate in Bagels All The Way at absolutely no cost.

And the Great Canadian Bagel has provided products such as bagels and cream cheese to be sold at the event, with proceeds of the show, following expenses, to be donated to the Hospital For Sick Children.

Gelbart and Fefer are visiting schools such as the Claude Watson School For The Arts and the Randolph School Of The Arts, in order to encourage participation. Al-

ANTHOLOGY CAPTURES ESSENCE OF A.M. KLEIN

A quarter-century after the death of Montreal writer A. M. Klein (1909-1972), a committee of scholars still meets regularly to coordinate publication by the University of Toronto Press of his poems, essays, stories, prose and letters under the series title of Collected Works.

In all, eight volumes have been planned. Although his Complete Poems, a deluxe two-volume set, appeared in 1990, its price of about $125 made it inaccessible to casual readers interested in discovering Klein's literary merit and enduring appeal.

Now the U of T Press has produced Selected Poems, a collection of 84 poems that an editorial board judged to be a representative sampling of his finest poetry. The anthology was edited by a troika of Klein scholars – Zailig Pollock, an English professor at Trent University in Peterborough; Seymour Mayne, an English professor at the University of Ottawa; and Usher Caplan, an editor at the National Gallery of Canada in Ottawa.

"We wanted to publish a relatively inexpensive selection of poems, which can be used in schools and which people can buy," Pollock said. "That's really been the aim of this. We wanted to get the word out on Klein."

A new edition of The Second Scroll, Klein's only novel, should be going to press in a few weeks and a volume of letters is due for publication in 1998, Pollock said. The Collected Works project is "the largest project of its kind for any writer in English Canada," he said.

According to Pollock, Klein was the first Canadian writer from outside of the Anglo-Saxon and French literary traditions to find his own voice and have a major literary impact.

"There were other writers of other backgrounds, but he was the first who really broke through his own community and had an international reputation. He won the Governor General's Award and he had a following in the United States. He was the first ethnic minority writer in Canada to be a major voice."

Selected Poems includes such widely acknowledged master works as Portrait of a Minyan, Design for Mediaeval Tapestry, Scribe, Out of the Pulver and the Polished Lens, and The Rocking Chair, a poem about Quebec.

The editors provide an illuminating 20-page introduction and a thorough annotation of Jewish, secular and literary textual references.

The book also contains three poems by Chaim Bialik that Klein translated from the original Hebrew.

"Uriel da Costa / Flightily ranted / Heresies one day, / Next day recanted," Klein wrote in 1931 in Out of the Pulver and the Polished Lens, which the editors describe as his "richest and most fully achieved statement of the Jewish themes which had dominated his poetry" in that period.

That line is just a tiny sample of Klein's magnificent wit, which the Selected Poems now makes more accessible than ever. U of T Press, softcover, $19.95.

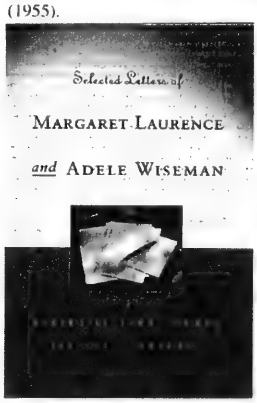
A bumper crop of great Canadian books

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to the CJN

Looking for some good Chanukah gifts to bestow upon your literary friends and relatives? Here are a bumper crop of Canadian titles to choose from, as well as a few more from south of the border.

Canadian writer Adele Wiseman (1928-1992) was only 28 years old when her novel The Sacrifice won resounding critical success and a Governor General's Award in 1956.

According to Ruth Panofsky and John Lennox, who are the editors of the recent Selected Letters of Margaret Laurence and Adele Wiseman (University of Toronto Press, $24.95), The Sacrifice was one of the first Canadian novels to explore Jewish life in Canada, preceded only by Henry Kreisel's The Rich Man (1948) and Mordecai Richler's Son of a Smaller Hero (1955).



From that point forward, Wiseman's writing career went into a slow decline, while that of her close friend Margaret Laurence steadily climbed uphill. Laurence ultimately produced such acclaimed novels as The Stone Angel (1964) and The Diviners (1974). Wiseman published a second novel Crackpot in 1974 and a few other works, but never regained her earlier fame.

Having met at the University of Manitoba, the two writers became lifelong "sister friends" who corresponded over four decades. Selected Letters reveals the depth of their respective artistic struggles and of their friendship, which was highly supportive with no trace of rivalry. "Please write," they often beseeched each other, in both the personal and professional sense.

Selected Letters is bound to generate new interest in Wiseman and her work.

A logical companion volume is The Life of Margaret Laurence, by James King (Knopf, $34.95) which also throws light on Laurence's relationship with Wiseman.

Mordecai Richler's 10th novel and his first written in the first person, Barney's Version (Knopf, $32.95) recently won the 1997 Giller Prize. The narrator, a Montreal Jew named Barney Panofsky, decides to tell his own story after his enemy prepares to publish damaging information about him, his three wives, and his friend Boogie, whom Barney was accused of murdering.

Barney's memory is failing and he's clearly in his dotage, yet he manages to entertain the reader with his Richleresque asides. Indeed, the novel is cluttered with bits of comic shtick, and it's often hard to tell whether they more rightly belong to Barney or Mordecai. But fans of Richler's satiric and frequently acerbic wit are sure not to mind.

Another Montreal writer, 85-year-old Yehuda Elberg, is finally getting some of the attention he so richly deserves. Two of Elberg's novels — Ship Of The Hunted (1974) and The Empire of Kalman the Cripple (1983) — were recently translated from the original Yiddish into English and published by Syracuse University Press ($26.95 U.S.each).

The first is a Holocaust novel, the second a novel of shtetl life before the Shoah. Both have already gone into second printing.

Manny Drukier, a Holocaust survivor who settled in Toronto in 1948, has led a varied business career as a manufacturer, importer, and publisher of The Idler and A la Carte magazines; at present he operates the Idler Pub in Toronto.

Now he is also a writer of a book that won the 1997 Jewish Book Award for Holocaust Literature.

A recent release by the University of Toronto Press, Carved in Stone: Holocaust Years — A Boy's Tale ($35) describes how Drukier and various family members survived Hitler's campaign of extermination. Drukier wrote the memoir after a short visit to Poland in 1991.

Bumper crop of books will please literary fans

The Porcupine's Quill, a publishing house located in Erin, Ont., has produced numerous books of distinction, including Promise of Shelter ($14.95), a collection of short stories by Montreal writer Robyn Sarah.

A master of subtlety and surrealism, Sarah's tales hint at the darkness, disorientation and danger that lurk behind ordinary life.

Also from Porcupine's Quill comes Jacob's Ladder ($16.95) by Joel Yanofsky, a romantic comedy set in suburban, anglophone Montreal against the backdrop of the 1995 sovereignty referendum.

Cary Fagan, meanwhile, weighs in with Sleeping Weather ($15.95), a compellingly readable novel set in midtownToronto. (Like Sarah, Fagan was a contributor to the latest issue of Parchment, the journal of contemporary Canadian-Jewish writing.)

Another Porcupine's Quill writer, Elizabeth Hay, recently attained prominence for Small Change ($16.95), a short-story anthology that was nominated for a Governor General's Award. These new works by Sarah, Yanofsky and Fagan are equally deserving of wide attention.

Phyllis Grosskurth, a professor of English at the University of Toronto, has gained prominence for her probing biographies of Havelock Ellis, Sigmund Freud and Melanie Klein; her first book, on John Addington Symonds, won the Governor General's Award for nonfiction.

Grosskurth recently completed a biography of the early 19th-century romantic poet, Lord Byron: The Flawed Angel (Macfarlane Walter & Ross, $39.95).

Byron had such an effect on young women that when he entered a room, mothers would lead their teenaged daughters away, and forbid them from looking at him. His tragic death in Greece in 1824, at the age of 36, apotheosised him into a mythic hero. But what was he really like?

After immersing herself in letters and other papers at Oxford, Grosskurth concludes that he was "an outsider, someone who viewed himself as different from other people." Her grand retelling of his life is the first biographical account of Lord Byron to appear in more than 40 years.

A curious sect known as the British Israelites, who believed the English were one of the lost tribes of Israel, pops up in the story "Speck's Idea" in The Selected Stories of Mavis Gallant, (McClelland & Stewart, $26.99).

Gallant, a master Canadian writer who has been compared with Tolstoy, is always a treat to read. Other intriguing recent works from McClelland &Stewart include Guy Vanderhaeghe's The Englishman's Boy ($14.99), Nino Ricci's Where She Has Gone ($29.99) and Jane Urquhart's The Underpainter ($29.99), winner of the 1997 Governor General's Award for English fiction.

Now for a few select American titles, starting with the charming Old Books, Rare Friends: Two Literary Sleuths and Their Shared Passion, by Leona Rostenberg & Madeleine Stern (Doubleday, $29.95).

The authors, who are known in the New York area as the "Holmes and Watson" of the rare book business, are famed for their many literary discoveries, such as the secret pseudonym (A.M. Barnard) used by Louisa May Alcott.

I came across Lawrence Schiffman's 1994 work Reclaiming the Dead Sea Scrolls (Jewish Publication Society $34.95) only recently, and regard it as one of the best scholarly books I've read on the subject.

Published this year, Jonathan Kirsch's The Harlot By The Side of the Road: Forbidden Tales of the Bible (Ballantyne, $37.50) retells some of the more lurid episodes of the Bible (involving Lot's daughters, Tamar, Dinah, Moses and others) and interprets them in a contemporary light.

How the Russians fell in love with the Big Mac

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The restaurant business in Russia is a far cry from what it is in North America. Last spring on a visit to mother Russia, I was asked by my interpreter/guide where I wanted to go for lunch.

Never having been to Russia before, I had no idea. Take me to a typical Russian restaurant, I suggested.

A blank look came over her face.

"I don't know of any restaurants," she said.

"Not any?" I asked, somewhat incredulous.

Well, everyone knows McDonald's, she replied.

Although my interpreter was in her mid-20s, she'd lived most of her life under communism and under communism, restaurants were as rare as a free press. Sure, there were restaurants for tourists and for the elite of Soviet society, but they accepted only hard currency and were inaccessible to the vast Russian lumpen proletariat.

My clueless guide explained that her family never went out to eat and neither did any of her friends. The only restaurant they knew of, outside of those in tourist hotels, was McDonald's.

It was into that world of exclusive eateries and a hamburger-hungry population that George Cohon, senior chair of McDonald's Restaurants of Canada, decided to import the incredibly successful McDonald's formula. At the McDonald's we visited in Moscow, patrons lined up 10 across and 10 deep to order their McSandwiches, Mcfries and Coke. Adults frequented the restaurant as much as teenagers and judging from their smiles, they enjoyed their food, despite paying (more or less) Canadian prices.

In To Russia With Fries, published by McClelland & Stewart ($32.50), Cohon tells how he brought the fast-food chain to the former Soviet Union. The book, written with David Macfarlane, is introduced by former Soviet premier Mikhail Gorbachev.

McDonald's is well-established now with 30 restaurants across the country, but opening the first one in 1990 was anything but a smooth venture.

Foreword by MIKHAIL GORBACHEV TO RUSSIA WITH FRIES
My adventures in Canada and Russia – having fun along the way
GEORGE COHON
with David Macfarlane

To Russia With Fries tells of George Cohon's Russian adventures.

The ambitious and energetic entrepreneur spent 14 years running into inexplicable bureaucratic roadblocks that would have taxed the patience of most other businessmen.

Cohon first got the idea of expanding into the Soviet Union in 1976 when he met a group of Soviets attending the Montreal Olympics. They loved McDonald's fare and Cohon realized that with a population of close to 250 million, the Soviet Union offered tremendous opportunities.

With that in view, he began his first go-round, trying to convince the Soviets to allow McDonald's to open for the 1980 Moscow Olympics. He thought he'd received Soviet approval and he was intensely disappointed when McDonald's was rebuffed for reasons unknown to him.

Cohon continued his efforts, enjoying a breakthrough thanks in large part to the ties he had developed with Gorbachev and with Aleksander Yakovlev, the former ambassador to Canada.

In January 1990, to much international fanfare, McDonald's opened its first restaurant in Moscow's Pushkin Square. More than 30,000 Muscovites lined up for hours to enjoy their first taste of Western capitalism.

For Russians, McDonald's was a revelation: "To be told that a restaurant would be a clean and friendly place, and then to find that it actually is. To order a Big Mac and then actually to get a Big Mac. To work, and then actually to get paid for your work. In their way, these were miracles in the Soviet Union of 1990."

Cohon's instinct for a good sell proved bang-on with his decision to expand to Russia. The Pushkin restaurant serves 40,000 customers a day, while the company's 30 restaurants in Russia have sales to equal 150 smaller Canadian restaurants. More are on the way.

To Russia With Fries, tells the story in an entertaining and breezy way. The book's tempo is fast-paced, like Cohon, and it meshes his Soviet adventures with a description of the development of McDonald's on the domestic front.

A successful businessman today, in 1967 Cohon was a dissatisfied corporate lawyer in his hometown of Chicago when the opportunity arose to obtain the eastern Canada rights to McDonald's. A risk-taker by nature, he grabbed the opportunity. From one restaurant in 1968, today McDonald's has more than 1,000 company-owned and franchised operations in Canada, generating close to $2 billion in sales.

With that kind of success, it's no surprise Cohon's ego is large – a fact he acknowledges in the book With anecdotes of his encounters with the rich and famous, Cohon graces nearly every one of the book's 335 pages. Yet he's gracious enough to give credit to the "Wolf Pack" of advisers who accompanied him on marathon negotiating sessions in Russia and to others who helped him get where he is today.

A longstanding supporter of Jewish and other causes, Cohon is donating his royalties from the book to Ronald McDonald Children's Charities of Canada. So far, it's proving quite popular. He's already raised $1 million.

Book by I Love Lucy writer a good read

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

It's hard to read surreptitiously when a book makes you laugh out loud. That was my problem with Laughs, Luck...and Lucy: How I came to Create the most Popular Sitcom of All Time. It arrived at my office on a deadline day, interfering significantly with my written output for the week.

I admit it – I'm biased. I'm an I Love Lucy fan from way back. For two years, I drank my tea from a heart-shaped I Love Lucy mug until it broke, and I even have a Vitameatavegamin t-shirt, commemorating one of the show's most popular episodes.

So it was a happy coincidence that I was in San Francisco in October when Gregg Oppenheimer, son of Lucy producer and head writer Jess Oppenheimer, was speaking there about the book his late father began and he completed. Published a year ago by Syracuse University Press, it's now in its fifth printing.

For Oppenheimer, a youthful 46-year-old who spent 18 years working as an attorney, San Francisco was the highlight of his book tour. Speaking to a capacity crowd in the Jewish Community Centre (JCC) auditorium where Jess Oppenheimer began his show business career in the 1930s, Gregg shared some of his own memories.

(Don't look for him in Canada soon; his book is available here only by mail order.)

Some of the goings-on in that JCC auditorium, including a scene in which Oppenheimer Sr. became handcuffed to a fellow actor, inspired I Love Lucy episodes, said his son.

A tense family situation involving Jess' mother's passport application in the 1930s also became fodder for an I Love Lucy episode, as described in the book.

Unless she could prove her German-born husband had been a naturalized citizen at the time of their 1910 marriage, Oppenheimer's 53-year-old Jewish mother was subject to deportation to Hitler's Germany.

"A sense of panic swept over us," he wrote.

Finally they learned that Oppenheimer's father had been naturalized in Sacramento, not San Francisco. Lucille Ball's ditzy alter ego Lucy Ricardo likewise had trouble obtaining her birth certificate – until she learned she was born in West Jamestown, not Jamestown.

By the time of his death in 1988, Oppenheimer had completed 85 pages of memoirs. Gregg picked up where his father had left off, initially intending the book as a family heirloom. "I was afraid my daughter wasn't going to remember him," he said in a recent phone interview from Santa Monica.

The writing is seamless. Oppenheimer said he surprises himself sometimes, figuring out which parts he wrote. "We used to finish each other's sentences. We basically have the same sense of humor. The book is supposed to give you the feeling you spent an evening with him telling you stories."

And, at 280 pages, it's an extended, very enjoyable evening. I suspect non-fans will also find it a worthwhile read, especially those with an interest in the early days of radio. Before I Love Lucy and its radio predecessor, My Favorite Husband, Oppenheimer wrote radio scripts for the likes of Fred Astaire, Jack Benny and Fanny Brice.

Only about half the memoir, it should be noted, is devoted to the Lucy years. But there is an accompanying 65-minute CD and several appendices, including a script that Ball's husband and co-star Desi Arnaz refused to perform.

Interesting sidenotes include Oppenheimer's account of his invention of the teleprompter.

Gregg Oppenheimer

And who would have thought that Ball needed to work so hard to master her material? According to Oppenheimer, a likely reaction to her first reading of a script would have been, "...get rid of the redhead. She doesn't know what the hell she's doing."

She sure figured it out. Today, reruns of the hit comedy that ran from 1951 to 1957 are seen daily around the world. "I think it's held up well because everybody can identify with it," Gregg told The CJN. "There are shows about jealousy, money problems, fighting with your friends. It's very well

Shoah book message of hope

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Born to Holocaust survivors in the post-war era, Torontonian Roma Karsh says she grew up "hearing stories that no one should ever know."

While her father didn't talk about his experiences in the concentration camps, her mother would tell anyone who would listen, Karsh said. From her teenaged years until she was well into her 30s, Roma couldn't bear hearing any more on the subject.

"If there were programs on TV, I tried to get away. I thought I would never be able to stomach those stories again."

However, Karsh ultimately realized that the Holocaust was an inevitable part of her family history, and she began seeking other sources in order to write a book. The result is Endless, a first novel published recently by Voyageur Publishing.

"People told me, 'You have got to write this book.' They said, 'This book is in you, just get it out,'" said Karsh, explaining that she wrote the book not only to help preserve the memory of the Jewish martyrs but to help those who carried the burden of survival.

Endless tells the story of a young Jewish girl in Krakow whose parents are deported to the death camps and who survives by hiding with a gentile family. It also tells the story of her brother, who survives the war and becomes a psychiatrist in Toronto, ultimately coming to terms with his survivor's guilt.

The title Endless comes from the Hebrew Ein Sof, an esoteric term meaning infinite or without end, usually referring to God. For Karsh, the word connotes both the endless suffering of the Holocaust and the endless hope that is forever a part of the human condition.

"My message is one of hope," she said. "If my parents, who were in the worst concentration camps, could come through what they came through, and then build the most productive lives and have children and grandchildren, then my message is that anyone can. My message is endless hope."

The book starts in 1941 and continues to the present, making reference to the debate over the prosecution of aging war criminals. Although it encapsulates the experiences of the Holocaust, it is more of a post-Holocaust novel in sensibility. According to Karsh, it speaks most directly to the children of survivors.

"It goes to the next generation, and to the children of the children of survivors," she said. "I have a 17-year-old daughter. Do you think she's not affected? She knows the stories and she knows that they're her legacy."

Endless, at 288 pages, is available from major bookstores for $24.95.

A subjective guide to city's top diners

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts editor

Back when he was a kid in the '40s Toronto lawyer and food critic Leonard Wise started making lists of where he'd eaten his best ice cream, French fries or danish pastries.

Fifty years and 210 items later, Wise had enough information for a book and published Toronto Eats from A to Z, an alphabetical listing of where to find the best of anything, from apple pie to zabaglione (an Italian dessert with wine, sugar and eggs).

Since the book sold well, here is the sequel, More Toronto Eats, which contains food items not included in the first.

In this one you'll read where to find the best pakora (an Indian dish), the best mushroom soup, the best omelette and many more foods.

Much of the book is filled with humor; for example, his description of abalone: "what tastes like an eraser and costs 50 bucks."

The book will be enjoyed by people who claim they know where to find the best pizza in town or who love to try new food and new places. Just keep in mind it's all highly subjective and oh yes, few, if any, of the restaurants listed are kosher.

Sitcom writer's story an entertaining read

written and beautifully performed."

It's also – ouch – sexist. "My take is that Lucy's a 10- or 11-year-old kid, although she's in the body of an adult, and male-female relationships in the '50s were closer to [adult-child relationships]," he explained. "You can watch it [in that context] and still enjoy it."

For Oppenheimer, Lucy has become pretty much a full-time job, for now. He's working on a live recreation of My Favorite Husband, to premiere at the Loving Lucy '98 convention next summer in Burbank, Calif.

Laughs, Luck...and Lucy can be ordered from Gregg Oppenheimer, Ste. 205, 1158 26th St., Santa Monica, CA 90403, or over the Internet at www.amazon.com. Order forms can be found on line at www.lucynet.com. Mail order price is $29.95 (US) plus $5 (US) for mailing to Canada. (It can be sent via courier on request.) December gift buyers pay $19.95 (US) plus shipping per autographed copy, when buying two copies.

Chaim Potok: The Gates of November

Soviet refuseniks' plight well told

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts editor

As I flipped through CJN back issues from the late '80s, I was hard-pressed to find an issue that didn't have a story about the plight of the Refuseniks – Russian citizens (mostly Jews) not allowed to emigrate.

Among the names cropping up in the articles were Anatoly Sharansky, Andrei Sakharov, Ida Nudel and the Slepaks – Volodya and Masha.

Chaim Potok's latest novel, The Gates of November, is a chronicle of the Slepaks, who applied to leave the Soviet Union in January 1970 and were finally granted exit visas in October 1987.

The irony of the Slepaks is that Volodya's father, Solomon, was an Old Bolshevik, an ardent Communist, who led an army in the Russian civil war.

At the outbreak of the revolution, Solomon saw hope in Russia's future. Lenin's Bolsheviks, he believed, would bring racial equality and justice for all. A zealous idealist, he absorbed the revolutionary fervor and battled White Russians and Japanese troops in the Far East.

After serving time as a diplomat in Japan and China after the Communist victory, Solomon moved with his wife and two children to Moscow, where in 1936, he worked for the news service Tass, surviving the Stalinist purges by refusing any position of leadership.

In the '50s, Stalin had become increasingly paranoid about foreigners and particularly any Russians who had contact with them. Also anti-Semitism, downplayed during the war years, was raising its ugly head once more.

This was around the time of the infamous Doctors' Plot, when Stalin began arresting leading doctors and accusing them of plotting to poison the leadership of Russia. Most of the doctors were Jewish.

"Mid-20th Century Russia had resurrected the medieval image of the Jew as poisoner," Potok writes.

He documents a classic father/son conflict, a staple of classic Turgenev/Dostoyevsky literature. Solomon's son Volodya and his wife Masha, a student at the medical school, confront Solomon with the news that all her professors are being arrested.

Solomon, still a devout Communist, defends the party with an Orwellian fanaticism. "The class struggle is now in its fiercest and most dangerous stage," he tells Volodya. "Look at us, we are surrounded by capitalist enemies. Isn't it better to arrest and prosecute a hundred innocent people and catch among them one spy than to let the spy go free?"

Volodya rejects this argument and denounces the party. "There is too much blood on your hands," he tells Solomon. "That I understand."

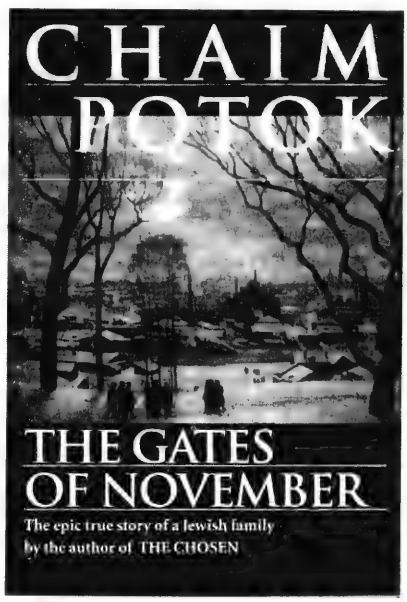
The rift between father and son, heightened when Volodya applies for an exit visa, would never be bridged.

By now, anti-Semitism had reached an almost Nazi-like hysteria. Rumors of deportations and evictions were beginning to circulate. Jews were being asked to vacate their Moscow apartments. However, unlike in Nazi Germany, salvation was partially at hand when Stalin died on March 5, 1953 and Kruschev denounced the Doctors' Plot.

By the time of the Six Day War, when anti-Israel and Zionist propaganda caused even more anti-Jewish hysteria, many Jews began seeking visas to enter Israel.

The Slepaks were by now hardened anti-Communists and their Moscow apartment became a meeting place for many Jewish activists. Because they knew the KGB was bugging their room, they communicated with chalk and blackboards. Volodya became an organizer of demonstrations, hunger strikes and letter-writing campaigns.

After the Slepaks officially applied for an exit visa (swiftly rejected for security reasons – Volodya had worked on the air-defence system of the U.S.S.R.), their lives became a living hell. They were followed by the KGB, their mail opened, pressure put on their children to denounce them and their apartment subject to searches. Volodya was eventually charged with anti-Soviet activity and exiled in Siberia for five years.



The Gates of November (Random House, $17.95) is a thoroughly researched and well-told story. In Potok's skilful hands, the Slepaks' struggle becomes a rich, conversational narrative.

Potok tells the story with the experience of a veteran fiction writer, and like a historical novel, his book uses the central characters' story to expound on the history of the dissident movement, Soviet anti-Semitism, the success of American pressure groups and the role Cold War politics had during the exodus of the 1970s.

Winnipeg detective tackles blood libel case

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Winnipeg writer Allan Levine has introduced a Jewish literary detective in his first novel, The Blood Libel, recently published by Great Plains Fiction (softcover, $19.95).

The novel is set in Winnipeg's North End in 1911, when the streets were teeming with impoverished immigrants. Levine's protagonist, 28-year-old Sam Klein, works in a brothel and turns gumshoe after a rabbi is accused of a murder that Klein is certain he didn't commit.

"He's a tough character," said Levine, who was in Toronto recently to give a reading at the Sleuth of Baker Street bookstore. "He's very knowledgeable about the streets, and he's forced to use his streetwise talents to investigate the murder."

The premise of The Blood Libel is that a Jew in Canada could be credibly accused of a blood libel murder – the slaughter of a Christian child – in order to use the blood for baking matzah and other ritualistic purposes.

Usually a product of anti-Semitism and mass hysteria, blood libel accusations and trials have recurred sporadically in Europe from medieval times until this century.

Allan Levine

Levine, who received a PhD in history from the University of Toronto, adeptly transplants this largely European social phenomenon onto his home turf. He demonstrates a keen historian's eye in bringing the booming frontier town to life, peopled with a colorful mix of crooks, grain merchants, police and prostitutes.

"The hardest part for me as a writer was creating credible characters and dialogue," he said. "I guess readers will have to judge that for themselves."

Levine, 41, is a teacher at a Winnipeg private school. He is the author of several non-fiction works on historical subjects, including a study of Winnipeg's grain trade.

"I think in most non-fiction writers, there's a novel waiting to jump out," he said.

While he has left the door open for a sequel novel featuring Sam Klein, he has already completed another non-fiction book. Fugitives of the Forest focuses on the roughly 35,000 to 40,000 Jewish partisans and other Jews who survived the Holocaust by hiding in the forests of eastern Europe. The book is due out from Stoddart in the fall of 1998.

Book celebrates highs and lows of Honest Ed

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

In a way, the title of Honest Ed Mirvish's new book, There's No Business Like Show Business – But I Wouldn't Ditch My Day Job, neatly defines his life.

At 85, this theatre impresario clings to his big, gaudy store because "a bargain is a bargain" and though he loves theatre, he is never sure if he has a hit.

Replete with 80 black and white photos, this 224-page hardcover (Key Porter Books) sells for $29.95.

Since 1963, when Mirvish bought the Royal Alexandra Theatre for $250,000, he has met some glamorous people, but he is still a storekeeper.

"It was good enough for Harry Truman, and good enough for Abe Lincoln, it's good enough for me."

The book is a celebration of the curtain calls and pratfalls of Mirvish's life in theatre. He reveals that Rex Harrison once gave his dressing-room refrigerator to his driver as a tip, and that Yul Brinner demanded that all the halls and dressing rooms of the Alex be painted dark brown

He remembers that Peter O'Toole always thought of himself as a "jobbing" actor, and that Lauren Bacall insisted her dressing room be outfitted with baby-blue broadloom – for the enjoyment of her three pet poodles.

He even discloses that actors, for some unknown reason, don't wear their own underwear on stage.

From Joan Plowright and Jonathan Miller to Gilda Radner and Andrea Martin, from John Gielgud and Ralph Richardson to Red Buttons and Lily Tomlin, Mirvish met and remembers them all.

He fondly describes his meeting with Diana, Princess of Wales, and relates how his landmark theatre became her namesake.

"What struck me most about her was her ability to connect with everyone on a personal level. She made everyone around her feel at ease."

When people ask him what his CBE (Commander of the British Empire) stands for, he says, "Creator of Bargains Everywhere."

Which is why he would never ditch his day job.

In his preface, Mirvish recalls how his father died in 1930 when he (Ed) was 15 and so he had to drop out of third year at high school to run his father's fruit and grocery store on Dundas Street.

He still goes to work at eight o'clock every morning at his Bloor Street store and has lunch in one of his King Street restaurants.

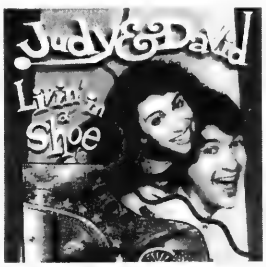
New Judy & David CD an eclectic mix of children's songs

By SUSAN RUDOLPH
Special to The CJN

Canada's musical duo Judy and David recently released their sixth album, Livin' in a Shoe. This collection of original songs for children is an eclectic mix of musical styles including Caribbean, soul and light rock.

Since their debut in February 1993, Judy and David have made numerous concert appearances and have amassed a tremendous following. Their albums have been translated into many different languages and have sold over five million cassettes around the world.



Livin' in a Shoe has already been called one of the top 10 albums of 1997 by Child magazine. The album manages to capture the energy of a live performance in an audio recording. The music, which was recorded both live and in studio, engages the young listener's attention and is completely interactive.

The sound effects used in many of the tracks enhance the music and immediately appeal to the imagination. Monkeys, waves, trains and cars can be heard throughout the album. The sounds complement the strong lyrics and musical arrangements by adding à story-like element.

The songs on Livin' in a Shoe are completely original. Sole Woman is a song loosely based on a Mother Goose nursery rhyme and includes terrific saxophone solos.

Later that Same Night at the Hen House is a sequel to Late One Night at the Hen House, which was on Judy and David's first album. In the follow-up song, a group of chickens and a cat burst into song.

The creative and amusing lyrics in Fish History poke fun at the food chain. And, in a special appearance, Judy and David's son briefly appears in the soft and gentle Lullaby.

Livin' in a Shoe marks a turning point in Judy and David's work. They have moved from presenting primarily old favorites to recording an album in which they have creating their own children's songs.

Guitarist highlights cultural diversity

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts editor

Because historically, Jews have travelled through and settled into so many countries, their music can be as diverse as the different cultures they've been a part of.

Yet beneath all this diversity is a similarity that can be detected whether the song hails from Spain or the far reaches of Russia.

Toronto guitarist Simon Wynberg explores this rich heritage on his newest CD Songs of my People (Narada), a contemporary arrangement of "old age music."

"There is a definite way that the notes are assembled," Wynberg said trying to explain the subtle similarity of the songs, despite the obvious cultural differences.

"Underneath the melody is the sacred traditions that wherever Jews travelled filtered through the secular melodies."

Wynberg has taken a collection of traditional Jewish songs and given them an instrumental contemporary flavor. Accompanying Simon on acoustic guitar are 11 other musicians with various sounds including wind instruments, strings and percussion.

In discovering his Jewish roots, Wynberg (who's recorded about 12 albums with chamber orchestras, string quartets and concert orchestras) picked songs from all over the Jewish spectrum.

It isn't just Yiddish traditional tunes, or klezmer. There are chassidic melodies, Sephardi keys, shtetl music and songs from Russia and the Mediterranean.

Some are sorrowful like Oyfin Pripetshik, some are joyful like Freylekhs and others celebratory like Scherele (a "Jewish line dance).

"I knew Jewish musical tradition was very broad and there was a huge amount of material to choose from," he said. "I wanted the songs I recorded to be appealing and not be too much of the same thing."

Wynberg's background in musicology gave him the experience necessary to facilitate his research of Jewish music. After sifting through libraries of recorded and unrecorded music he finally settled on these 14 songs.

Chanukah whodunnit a software treat

By BRAD LAKRITZ
Jewish Bulletin of Northern California

What do Mademoiselle Menorah, Crystal the fortune teller, the Latke Troll, Schlemiel the synagogue repairman and Groucho Cat have in common?

These sophisticated, full-color, claymation figures are all suspects in a daring make-believe Jewish caper.

One of them has stolen the actual jar of oil found by Judah Maccabee in the Temple after its destruction at the hands of the ancient Greeks.

Your job is to find out Who Stole Hanukkah?! This exciting new CD-ROM from Jerusalem Multimedia Productions runs on Windows and Macintosh formats and is out just in time for Chanukah 5758.

Players who celebrate Chanukah this year by clicking their way through this whodunit will learn many tidbits of Jewish history along the way.

The mystery begins as the world-famous historian Prof. Croak gazes at his prize archeological possession, the Temple oil jar, while sipping a cup of tea. Suddenly, the lights go out, loud noises blast the night air and when the lights come back on, the jar is missing.

Finding yourself out on the street in the dark winter night, you have only the trenchcoated Nerly, a hot-shot detective, to help you solve the crime in time to celebrate the Festival of Lights.

Nerly's namesake, ner, is Hebrew for candle – so the detective's hat sports a distinctive flame.

Nerly guides you through the clues and she presents information about each suspect. To discover the culprit, you must visit each of the suspects and examine the evidence linking them to the crime.

The street scene is your guide – or computer interface – to the game. The building facing you has eight windows that you can enter by clicking. Entering the building, you find yourself in a hallway with three doors. One of the doors takes you to Nerly's room, where she offers hints and helps you examine the evidence.

But you can't enter Nerly's room without a secret password and a golden key. In order to win these essentials, you'll have to go elsewhere first.

One room presents a dramatic scene from the time of the Maccabees.

In the scene, which North American Jews might find familiar because of its parallels with assimilation issues, a Hellenist family debates the virtues of Judaism versus Greek culture. The father is on his way to the bathhouse while the mother is making the Sabbath meal. The son quotes from the Torah, saying that Jews should have one God and no other, while his sister speaks up for trying out a few new ones.

In this scene, correctly answering a question about the Hellenistic period will secure for the player the secret password. Clicking again on the password icon will activate more questions for those who want to learn more about the history of Chanukah or just test their knowledge.

For players who don't know the answers to the questions, help is just a click away. Prof. Croak's study offers access to a rich set of resources on Chanukah, including a how-to guide for celebrating the holiday, as well as quotations from many of the Jewish sources that explain how and why we celebrate the holiday.

For example, we learn from the Babylonian Talmud about the edict of "publicizing the miracle" and explore arguments over lighting the menorah from right to left or vice versa, and whether to add or take away one candle each night during the holiday.

The CD operates in English, Hebrew, Russian, French and Spanish – a rarity in multimedia CDs.

With Who Stole Hanukkah?!, JeMM Productions – makers of The Interactive Haggadah – have produced a creative and educational game. It will provide hours of enjoyable Jewish learning for kids of all ages, but the game does require QuickTime 2.5 video software, and Indeor video system extensions (provided).

Who Stole Hanukkah?! is available from JeMM Productions for $19.95 (US), with bulk discounts to Jewish organizations. Information: JeMM, P. O. Box 1030, Manchester N.H. 03105-1030; or on the World Wide Web at [http://www.jemm.co.il].

Synagogue Youth fundraising concert a hit

By SUSAN RUDOLPH
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The National Conference of Synagogue Youth (NCSY) recently held its 17th annual fundraising concert.

The performance at the Basset Theatre featured acts by the Nafshenu Orchestra, The Toronto Jewish Male Choir, Mendy Wald and Dedi.

"We filled up the hall with 1,400 people," said Rabbi Glenn Black, regional director of NCSY. "NCSY is an outreach organization, not a concert business. It shows you that people didn't come out [just] for the music; they came out for the kids."

NCSY, the youth arm of the Union of Orthodox Jewish Congregations of America, has regional offices throughout North America and Israel. It reaches out to Jewish youth with group events and publications, as well as maintaining and expanding extensive youth programs around the world.

The concert began with a medley of traditional songs from The Toronto Jewish Male Choir, which is comprised entirely of amateur singers whose love of music was evident in their performance. Clear, powerful solos were supported by strong background vocals.

Mendy, who performed after the men's choir, animated the audience with his energetic and upbeat melodies. He had the crowd clapping and singing along with him as he sang popular numbers like Sameach. One audience member was so enthused by Mendy's performance that he spontaneously ran onto the stage and began to dance with the star.

The applause was deafening when Dedi, a superstar in Jewish music, took the stage. His energetic performance, beautiful voice, charisma and clever stage antics had the audience captivated throughout his act. Everyone in the theatre was singing, clapping and laughing along with Dedi as he sang songs such as Rotzoh and Lechah Eten.

Throughout the evening, NCSY members spoke about their experiences with the organization. They described how NCSY has helped them to reaffirm and reconnect to their Jewish roots.

The NCSY concert managed to accomplish what many other performances do not. The show contained acts that appealed to all the generations present while it helped to fund a worthy cause.

Associated basketball rivalry boosts spirits

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — No one will mistake it for the Montreal-Toronto hockey rivalry, but emotions get pretty high when the Danilack Hawks of Associated Hebrew Schools tips off versus the Hurwich branch in interschool basketball competition.

Danilack gets its biggest spectator turnout of the year — more than 50 people — when the two schools lock horns, said Shawn Karry, head coach of the Hawks. It's a similar situation when USDS Bayview butts heads with USDS Bathurst, as the natural rivalries help boost school spirit and are a focal point for each team's season, he said.

The games are part of the interschool boys league, a regular feature of the junior high school year. The opening tip off was held in November and the season runs until February when it's the turn of the girls to take to the court. Their league runs until May.

In addition to the two Associated teams and the two branches of United Synagogue Day School (USDS), teams from Netivot Hatorah, Bialik and Leo Baeck round out the league.

The longstanding interschool league expanded to its current seven-team format three years ago, Karry said. "The focus of the league is sportsmanship, fair play and skill development within a competitive atmosphere," he added.

The popularity of the league is considerable, if Danilack is any indication. At the start of the season, open tryouts were announced and "I had 75 percent of the male population of the school try out, about 80 guys," he said.

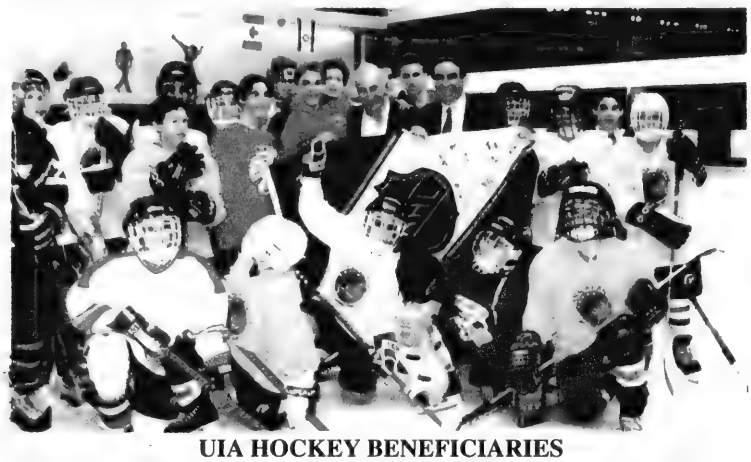
Only 10 players were selected to the rep team while the others get their hoops action in intramural games.

The rep teams play a 12 game schedule (six home, six away) before girding their loins for the playoffs. Last year, USDS Bayview recorded an undefeated season before beating Bialik in the championship game. The Bayview girls team won their championship as well.

Bayview boys looks to be a contender again this year, but not as dominant as last, needing overtime to beat Danilack in a game earlier this season, Karry said.

After the season ends in February, some of the schools participate in exhibition games against public and Roman Catholic schools. "The Jewish schools have done well...It's an opportunity to extend our season and get some games in. The kids always want more," Karry said.

The girls league is just as popular, he added, noting that the turnout for tryouts is comparable to the boys.



UIA HOCKEY BENEFICIARIES

An NHL flag signed by all participants in the first-ever Roger Neilson Hockey Camp, which took place in Metulla this past summer, was presented to UIA Canada past president Gerald Halbert by Israeli hockey players who have been beneficiaries of scholarship programs created through UIA at Metulla's Canada Centre. Metulla mayor Yossi Goldberg (left of Halbert) looks on.

Jewish Athletes to Hall of Fame

By TOM TUGEND
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LOS ANGELES — Nine athletes from five countries were recently elected into the International Jewish Sports Hall of Fame.

The 1998 honorees include four Americans: Marv Levy, who coached the National Football League's Buffalo Bills to four consecutive Super Bowls (1990-93); David Stern, commissioner of the National Basketball Association since 1984; Cpl. "Izzie" Schwartz, world flyweight boxing champion from 1927-29; and A.J. Liebling, celebrated author and New Yorker magazine boxing writer from the 1930s to the 1950s.

Passport to winter

TORONTO — The North York Ski Centre is offering free skiing and snowboarding to grade five students.

The Ski and Snowboard Passport entitles fifth-graders to three complimentary one-day lift tickets at 25 participating ski resorts in Ontario, including the North York Ski Centre. The passport is good until the end of the ski season, excluding Christmas and March breaks. Each child must be accompanied by a full-price paying adult, but each adult can bring up to two passport holders per visit.

Chanukah Continuity Campaign

As our way of helping to ensure the irreversibility of Jewish continuity, The CJN is launching a special continuity subscription campaign in time for Chanukah. We have decided to offer our readers a special, one-time opportunity to provide their children or their grandchildren with their own subscription to The CJN.

A gift subscription for your child or grandchild, who does not already subscribe to The CJN, will cost $14.95 (taxes included) for one full year to anywhere in Canada.

Over the past few years, The CJN has grown and evolved into an award-winning national community newspaper widely read both here in Canada and abroad. We are extremely proud of this publication. Could there be a better gift at Chanukah for your child or grandchild than the opportunity to feel part of the Jewish community?

Sincerely,

Mordechai Bauman

The editor.

The Inside Back

ספרותנו

מאת: יעל זליגר

אין זו אגדה: הסיפור והמעשה מאת: יואל רפל, בהוצאת ידיעות אחרונות, ספרי חמד, 1997, הוא ספר, ספק אלבום, מרחיב עין ועשיר בתוכן.

בדברי הפתיחה מצטט המחבר את י.ח. ברנר כאשר ברנר הנציח את המוטו לחוברות "המעורר" שראו אור בראשית המאה, בלונדון; "כי לעוררך אני בא אחי. לעוררך לאמר: שאל, בן-אדם לנתיבות עולם, שאל אי הדרך, אי?..." ובדרך זו מסביר המחבר, יואל רפל, הוא מבקש לחקדיש את ספרו חיפה ליחידי חסגולה ששאלו, עוררו ובקשו את חדרך הציונית. 176 עמודים מעוטבים בחדר. כתבות מעוטרות בצילומים מרתקים ומקורות היסטוריים ראשוניים יקרי ערך.

בספר גם תיעוד תופעות כאובות מזמן חיישוב כמו קריקטורות חמתארות בלעג די אכזרי את חעולים מגרמניה.

ZUCCHINI PARMESAN LATKES

2 lbs. zucchini	1 tsp chopped garlic	2 tsp sugar
1/2 lb. potatoes, peeled	3/4 cup chopped parsley	1/3 cup flour
1/2 tblsp lemon juice	1 tsp salt	2 medium eggs
1 cup chopped scallions	1/2 tblsp pepper	oil for frying
1/2 cup grated Parmesan cheese

Grate zucchini and potatoes, drain well and toss in the lemon juice to prevent browning. It is important that you get almost all the moisture out of the vegetables. Add the scallions, cheese, garlic, 1/2 cup parsley, salt and pepper, sugar, flour, and eggs and toss to make sure that the ingredients are well mixed.

Heat a 1/2" of oil in a pan until hot and add silver dollar-size mounds of batter, frying over high heat until golden brown and crispy. When serving, sprinkle with a little more salt and the remaining chopped parsley. Yield: 24 pancakes.

About families

Dear Susan,

Our 14-year-old son has a peanut allergy. He is about to go on a weekend school trip, and my husband and I have a number of concerns. First of all, we worry about how he will control his food intake. We are also concerned how he will deal with the girls who will be going on the trip with him. If he decides to kiss a girl, he needs to know what she has eaten or this may trigger an attack, and we don't know how we can be sure he will do this. Help!

Sleepless

Dear Sleepless,

Being the parent of a 14-year-old is no easy task. They are at a stage in their lives when they tend to buck authority. They also tend to be more fearless than parents would like, since they consider themselves to be all-powerful. While these tendencies will test a parent at the best of times, the situation you present certainly poses a unique set of difficulties.

I assume that your son has lived with his peanut allergy for some time. I am sure that over the years he has learned to ask appropriate questions, and reject any food or food provider if he is concerned that the proper precautions have not been taken.

You can discuss the trip and the precautions he can take to protect himself. These can include making sure that he takes an adequate supply of EPI pens, identifying local hospitals and ensuring that he has ascertained the quickest route to available medical help. Your son should wear a Medic Alert bracelet or chain, as well as carry a health card with allergy information. Appealing to your son's sense of responsibility will elicit a more positive response.

Your second question deals with sexuality, which is also a dominant influence on your son's behavior. Your challenge is to encourage safe sex with an added twist that can be humorous but also extremely difficult and potentially embarrassing and dangerous. The fact is that few boys of his age have the capacity to slow down and not give in to the powerful urges inside them. You can suggest that your son's need to ensure that his date will not pose a threat to him can be addressed as a type of foreplay, part of getting acquainted. He will have to learn to ask the right questions in the right way, and to sensitize those girls he becomes involved with to be cognizant of what they eat so that they do not compromise his health.

Susan Leventhal is a family, marital and individual therapist, who has been practising for more than 18 years.

Jews targeted by hate mail

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) was stunned last week with what it called the biggest mass hate mailing in Canada in years.

CJC says nearly 100 people across the country – judges, academics, journalists, lawyers and CEOs – reported receiving a single-spaced, eight-page diatribe against Jews, mailed from Chicago.

"It's incredible," said CJC's Bernie Farber. "In my 14 years here, I've never seen anything like it. It's the most extensive hate mail campaign I've seen."

'I've never seen anything like it': Bernie Farber

A large number of non-Jews also received the mailing, Farber said. "There seems to be no rhyme or reason behind it."

Farber said he's familiar with the tract, dated October, 1995. Titled Anti-Semitism — Found, it's a hate-filled response to U.S. conservative commentator William Buckley's much-praised book In Search of Anti-Semitism.

The mailing contains standard anti-Jewish canards: that Jews control the United States media, monetary system, the entertainment business and are behind a plot to impose a "one world" order.

It also denies the Holocaust.

Farber agrees that not only is the missive not crude, like other anti-Semitic attacks, but it's lucidly written and organized.

CJC suspects the mailing is from the Chicago-based American Socialist Workers' Party, another name for the American Nazi Party. The tract arrived in a plain white envelope, with a 20 cent U.S. stamp. That made it more expensive to mail than it would have been had they used a postage meter, Farber noted, but a meter would have been traceable.

There's little that can be done about the mailings, CJC said, because they came from the United States and looked innocuous.

Congress has passed the material to the RCMP and to Metro Police's hate crimes unit. It's asking its regions across the country to

CELEBRATING CHANUKAH

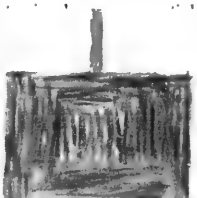
We clasp hands

Editorial

In ancient times, Chanukah was considered a "minor" holiday in that its origin was outside the Five Books of Moses. But this "minor" holiday evolved over the years into a major celebration. Like a burst of sunlight on an awakening grey morn, it inflamed the imaginations of succeeding generations with indescribable energy. The story of Matityahu, the old, brave man and his five brave sons, and of Hannah, the brave woman and her seven brave sons, helped to stir a people's soul and burnished for us our own armor of courage.

But it has been more than the jaw-dropping heroism of the Maccabees, more than the sheer force of the story and its lessons that explains the holiday's seismic pull upon our hearts.

Perhaps more than any of our holidays, major or minor, Chanukah speaks mo[illegible] to our children. Chan[illegible] There are the spinning games of the dreidels, the tasty treats that we eat, the chocolate coins we generously donate for non-charitable purposes,and the eight-day progression of light.



But as the accom[illegible] panying drawing cle[illegible] captures, it is clear th[illegible] of the truly compelling Chanukah speaks so[illegible] our children is because during Chanukah, we, their parents, "speak" directly to our children.

For eight days, we hold onto each other. We clasp hands. We [illegible]t the "old ways." We [illegible]estament of Matityahu. We offer blessings and in turn are ourselves blessed to be alive, able to see the candlelight dance and flicker in the eyes of our children, and privileged to live at a time when we can contribute to the building of a better [illegible]orld for them and for [illegible]ildren all over the [illegible]ld.

Happy Chanukah.

Halachah and fetal reduction

By RABBI CHAIM STEINMETZ

The birth of the McCaughey septuplets has made medical history and become a media sensation. After learning that they were expecting septuplets, the McCaugheys refused to abort some of the fetuses, because of their opposition to abortion. How would Jewish law view fetal reduction?

Comparative Law

This complex issue is discussed in two recent articles (Multi-Fetal Pregnancy Reduction, by Yitzchak Mehlman, Journal of Halacha and Contemporary Society XXVII (Spring 1994), and Pregnancy Reduction by J. David Bleich, Tradition (Spring 1995). Strong arguments can be made to either prohibit or permit fetal reduction. Essentially, the ethics of fetal reduction are based on two questions: Is abortion ethical? Is it acceptable to kill a few lives to save other lives?

Halachah is unequivocal that abortion for no compelling reason is prohibited (Sanhedrin 57b). It is equally unequivocal that an abortion must be performed when the pregnancy threatens the mother's life (Ohalot 7:6). In between, there is much debate about when abortion is permitted.

Some say that abortion is only allowed when the mother's life is threatened (Rabbi Moshe Feinstein, Iggrot Moshe, Even HaEzer 4:69-70). Others allow abortions in cases of great need, such as the abortion of a fetus conceived by adultery, or the abortion of a fetus with Tay-Sachs disease (see Rabbi Eliezer Waldenberg, Tzitz Eliezer 9:237).

According to this latter opinion, a septuplet pregnancy certainly constitutes great need. Even in the times of the Talmud, there was concern that fetuses may harm each other (Niddah 25b). Presently, studies show that a pregnancy larger than triplets poses a serious risk of miscarriage. This is sufficient cause to allow fetal reduction in large pregnancies.

However, many contemporary authorities follow the view that abortion is allowed only if it threatens the mother's life. If so, the important question is: Can you kill a few fetuses to save the others? This question is actually a rephrasing of the dilemma of lifeboat ethics: Can you kill one person to save the lives of many?

The Talmud Yerushalmi (Terumot 8:4) states that if a group of people are accosted by aggressors who say give us one of your party or we will kill all of you, the victims may not choose who to give over, even if this results in the entire group dying.

However, if the aggressors name a specific person, there is a disagreement. Rabbi Yochanan allows the group to hand over the specified person. Rabbi Shimon ben Lakish says this is allowed only if the specified person is guilty of a capital crime. Both agree that the victims may not choose one member of the group to be sacrificed, for it is ethically impossible to choose; no life is more important than another.

Based on this, one could argue that in the case of a multiple pregnancy, it is impossible to choose one fetus over another, and no fetal reduction is allowed.

However, other sources take a different approach to this dilemma. Some allow the group of victims to conduct a lottery to decide who to hand over (Pitchei Teshuvah 157:13). This was opposed by Chazon Ish (Sanhedrin 25). Another opinion (Tosefta Terumot 7:20, Rashi, Sanhedrin 72b, Yatza, Panim Meirot III:8), disputes the Yerushalmi, and allows the group, provided it is certain the entire group will die, to hand over an individual, even if no specification has occurred.

Based on these opinions, fetal reduction would be allowed if there is an assumption that the mother will probably miscarry. In addition, some argue that in a situation where the fetuses will probably not live, abortion would not be prohibited, because the prohibition applies only to the abortion of a viable fetus.

The question of fetal reduction touches on two controversial ethical questions. Although one could argue that fetal reduction is halachically prohibited, it appears that the majority of halachic opinions would allow fetal reduction to preserve the viability of a pregnancy.

Commission reverses position against tombstone manufacturer

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Quebec's language police suddenly closed the file on a complaint against a Jewish tombstone manufacturer that a five-letter Hebrew word on his sign was too big in relation to the French translation.

Adverse media coverage and a comment from Louise Beaudoin, the minister responsible for the French language charter, apparently promoted the Commission de protection de la langue française to withdraw its demand that L. Berson & Fils, a St. Lawrence Boulevard landmark for 75 years, change a sign in which the word "mitzeivot" was deemed not the right size in relation to "monuments."

On the morning the story hit the news, owner Mendy Berson received a telephone call from the commission that the matter was over, without giving a reason why. A commission spokesperson confirmed that the case was indeed closed, but would not comment further.

Beaudoin said in the National Assembly that this was a case of civil servants enforcing the law too strictly and urged reconsideration.

Berson said he would only believe the affair was truly over when he received a confirmation in writing.

Berson received a notice last week from the commission that "monuments," the French translation of the Hebrew "mitzeivot," was not "clearly predominant," as the law stipulates.

Berson has two outdoor signs with the Hebrew word. The most prominent one does feature the characters of "mitzeivot" slightly larger than those of "monuments," which is both French and English, but it is at least 50 years old, Berson said. On the second sign, erected some 20 years ago, the two words are the same size. The corporate name, L. Berson & Fils Inc., appears in French only.

Berson said he would have changed the sign only if the commission could convince him that "five Hebrew letters really, really infringe on the French language.

Zundel's wife expresses fear for her safety

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In a remarkable day of testimony that included bombshell after bombshell, Ernst Zundel's estranged wife said she feared for her life because of her testimony against her husband.

"In the last two months, I have been frightened and intimidated by Mr. Zundel and his associates," Irene Zundel said last week.

"Zundel got people to try to intimidate me and he wrote things that made me fear for the safety of me and my son," Irene Zundel said.

She was testifying before a Human Rights Commission tribunal that is looking into allegations that Ernst Zundel operated a computer Web site that distributed material likely to expose persons to hatred or contempt. Her initial testimony was given in mid-October and she has returned for cross-examination from her home in the United States.

Irene Zundel, who entered the courtroom accompanied by several plainclothes police officers, told the tribunal she felt she was testifying under duress because she was "threatened by my husband" and she felt "under threat of fear of my life."

The tribunal appeared to ignore her concerns, prompting several addresses from the witness box by Irene Zundel as the day's hearings concluded. She said she felt her concerns were not being addressed by the tribunal or by the numerous lawyers in the hearing room. She said she felt some questions by defence lawyer Doug Christie affected her rights. At the end of the day, the tribunal permitted commission counsel to direct her how to retain independent counsel.

But prior to that, Irene Zundel repeated the assertions she made in October, namely that Ernst Zundel controlled the content of the California-based Web site, known as Zundelsite, and that he instructed Marc Lemire in Toronto to post material to the site.

She also testified that Zundel was unfaithful during their marriage and she referred to Ingrid Rimland, the U.S.-based woman who ostensibly operates the Web site, as his "mattress cover."

She also told the tribunal that Zundel had decided to immigrate to the United States after all his legal cases in Canada were concluded. They planned to set up a "family Web site" and run it from their kitchen table. The site would have included a children's section, she said, but those plans were dashed when their marriage dissolved.

Irene Zundel's assertion that she feared for her life seemed to restrain Christie somewhat, who earlier in the week had adopted a contemptuous tone when questioning an Internet expert.

But at one point during cross-examination, Irene Zundel told Christie, "I don't particularly care for you to smirk about my concerns."

At another point, when Christie asked if he could approach the witness stand to show her a document, she said: "As long as you don't physically strike me."

Under cross-examination, Irene Zundel maintained that Lemire was paid by Zundel to post material to the Zundelsite. Asked by Christie how she knew he was paid for that, she said: "Five days a week, Marc shows up. Five days a week Zundel tells him what to do and the work gets done...and a cheque is left on Lemire's computer."

Under further questioning, Irene Zundel rattled off a list of five others on Zundel's payroll and named another person who assisted him as a volunteer.

In other testimony, Christie sparred with Ian Angus, president of Angus TeleManagement Group, on technical aspects of the Internet. Angus testified the Internet was a communications system that for the most part, used telephone lines to transmit information between computers.

Much of Christie's questioning centred on the definitions of "telephony" and "telephonic." Angus maintained that telephony included transmission of text data and other information, while Christie pointed to several dictionaries that defined it as transmission of sound.

The issue is key because the section of the Canadian Human Rights Act that Zundel is alleged to have breached makes it unlawful to promote hatred or contempt "telephonically" or "by means of the facilities of a telecommunication undertaking."

In other testimony, Toronto Mayor Barbara Hall said she viewed material from Zundelsite and concluded it could lead to violence and hostility.

The Toronto Mayor's Committee on Community and Race Relations, along with Holocaust survivor Sabina Citron, laid the initial human rights complaint against Zundel. The case is the first to apply human rights legislation to the Internet.

The week's activities began with applications from Paul Fromm, a former Peel-area school teacher who lost his job for associating with racists, and Lemire for intervener status. While Lemire's application was rejected, Fromm was permitted to participate in the hearing.

A time to reminisce

Every Jewish holiday evokes memories of family and home. Chanukah, in particular, seems to inspire reminiscences of grandmother.

The following story, which was published in Viewpoints in the late 80's, describes a visit with my grandmother that took place more than a decade ago.

It is through the interplay of life's opposites that we gain insight into ourselves.

We are moved by this reflection because in the silence of still moments we understand very clearly that this is the truth of the human condition.

With my young children I recently went to visit my grandmother, a lovely woman, an old woman, a woman of ninety. Unlike the opposites of nature, there was no subtlety to the juxtaposition of opposites in this instance. My daughters, in the very dawn of their lives, their senses, their energy, their vitality awakening daily to unlimited possibilities. My grandmother, in the same room, struggling with dusk, depleted of physical essence, her lifeforce receding. For her, no possibilities are left. The real pathos of growing old is losing faith in one's possibilities. The day that she entered the nursing home is the day that she lost that faith.

As a rule, it is difficult to engraft the obligations of one's own heart upon the hearts of one's children. After all, one person's loves may be another person's chores. This is ever more so the case when the parent's heart is deeply obliged to an enfeebled, blind, old woman whose very appearance, simply, is unsettling to the youngsters. And yet, this old woman is my grandmother, the mother of my mother, the woman whose home was my home, whose arms were my arms, whose laughter was my laughter, whose love was my love. But she will never be to my children what she was to me; nor can I make it so. Knowing this, I ache.

When we arrive at the nursing home, the children cling to each other and to me. They are frightened, frankly, by the faces, the sounds, the gestures, the misshapen postures of so many of the people, who, from their wheelchairs, greet them with curiosity in the main lobby.

All eyes focus upon the four young, little curly-tops who have entered their building, their home. This merely quickens the pace of the girls. We go directly to the elevator. It smells faintly, though unmistakably, of dried urine. The girls look at each other, then at me, in silent acknowledgement of the fact.

The same faces, the same sounds, the same gestures, the same postures, though of different persons, await us in a hollow congregation of wheelchairs and walkers as we emerge from the elevator.

The girls still hold fast to each other's hands.

We enter my grandmother's room, her home. She is standing slightly bent over, holding onto her walker. She is inclined toward the doorway, but she is not walking. Her look is toward the doorway, but she does not see.

I call her name. I announce my arrival loudly, affectionately. Like a strong, reviving breeze into a limp sail, the sound of my voice immediately straightens her up. More to herself than to me, in whisper, she says my name twice.

"I have the girls with me. They came to see you. They wanted to come."

I walk quickly, directly to her. I kiss her on her forehead, in her hair. I hold her face in my hands caressing her cheeks, tracing with my fingers the gaunt shape and the leathery texture of her face. Her eyes close as I touch her. She places a hand over mine as it passes across her cheek. She is still standing. And the children are carefully watching my love for her.

She can see only the shapes of the four young visitors, who are now standing in a tiny cluster at her side. She cannot see their faces. She gropes for them, asking me to identify for her each child as she feels for their bodies.

Each child steps forward without hesitation to embrace and to be embraced by this very old woman, to kiss her and offer up the sound of their voices and the touch and the smell of their bodies to her. They have left their fear in the hallway and for this I am truly grateful.

I guide my grandmother to the largest chair in her one-room home. I sit down beside her. I do not let go of her hand. The girls hover around us, close enough to my grandmother that she is constantly touching them, and staring at them, and even laughing.

The conversation does not matter, although it is unceasing. There are no silent moments because silence is her normal companion. For now, this very short time being, I, her grandson, and my four children, are her companions.

Inevitably, our visit must end. I whisper to my grandmother that it is time for me to take the girls home. I cannot hide my melancholy. She senses this.

"Bring the little girls forward, so that I may bless them."

Like Joseph at his father's final bedside, I present each of the girls, one at a time for the invocation of my grandmother's blessing. Each in her turn, I bring a child near to her.

She kisses them and embraces them. She carefully speaks individually to each girl her words of promise and of possibility.

The tears are in my eyes alone.

Outside, as we leave the building, my grandmother's home, the girls run and skip to the car. I walk slowly, now with my fear. And the person for whom I fear, I have just left behind.

My grandmother died ten years ago on January 10, 1988, a short time after the visit. —MBD

Ottawa names Windsor man as alleged Nazi war criminal

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The federal government last week made good on its promise to name another alleged Nazi war criminal targeted for deportation.

Ottawa accused Windsor resident Michael Baumgartner, 73, of lying about his wartime past to enter Canada in the early 1950s, and later when he became a citizen.

The charges against Baumgartner allege he was a guard at two Nazi concentration camps, Sachsenhausen and Stutthof.

The Justice Department says Baumgartner failed to disclose "his collaboration with German authorities while engaged in activities associated with forced labor and concentration camps" in 1942 and 1943.

The charges, filed in the Federal Court of Canada, also allege that Baumgartner concealed his membership in the Waffen SS when he entered Canada.

Baumgartner is the 14th alleged Nazi war criminal targeted for stripping of citizenship and deportation since Ottawa shifted its policy away from criminal trials in 1995.

The charges against him come just a week after the government announced it will pursue denaturalization and deportation proceedings against Wasyl Odynsky, 73, of Scarborough.

Became citizen in 1959

He's alleged to have been a guard at labor and concentration camps in Poland in 1943 and 1944 [CJN, Dec. 18].

Earlier this month, Paul Vickery, chief prosecutor in the Justice Department's war crimes unit, assured Jewish leaders that Ottawa would move against two more suspects – the 13th and 14th – "in the near future."

Baumgartner is a native of Sokunda, Hungary, and became a citizen in 1959.

The Encyclopedia Judaica says 100,000 people died at Sachsenhausen, near Berlin. Jews rounded up on Kristallnacht in 1938 were shipped there.

At Stutthof, near Danzig in Nazi-occupied Poland, 52,000 Jewish prisoners were interned. Only about 3,000 of them survived.

Baumgartner maintained his innocence last week, saying he was not a soldier at the time.

His lawyer, Steve Harvey, was quoted as saying that "most" of the allegations against his client are comprised of personal interviews conducted by the RCMP "with counsel present and without [Baumgartner] corroborating the information."

Denaturalization and deportation proceedings against four other alleged Nazi war criminals are to begin within the next eight months.

The trial of suspected war criminal Vladimir Katriuk, 76, began in Montreal earlier this month [CJN, Dec. 11], while judgment in the case against Wasily Bogutin of Toronto is expected next month.

Earlier this year, the Supreme Court of Canada reinstated charges against three other alleged Nazi criminals, Erichs Tobiass, Helmut Oberlander and Johann Dueck. Preliminary motions in those cases continue.

Two other suspects have died since 1995, while one, Ladislaus Csizsik-Csatary, 82, voluntarily left Canada after the federal cabinet stripped him of his citizenship in August.

In a statement, Irving Abella, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress's war crimes committee, said there's "increasing evidence" that Ottawa is committed to bringing Nazi war criminals to justice.

CORRECTION

An article in last week's CJN on Russian immigrant Arkadi Kogan having been cheated out of his life savings stated that a company he invested in prior to leaving Moscow was Russian. In fact, the firm, Israsov, was advertised as an Israeli company.

VILLAGE SHUL GROUNDBREAKING
Ground was turned last week for the new $6 million Village Shul, at Eglinton Avenue and Old Park Road, expected to open next September. The 24,000-square foot synagogue will house a Hebrew school, rooftop playground, social hall and a Jewish learning library. The 100-family Village Shul has been located in a nearby storefront for the last seven years. Palestinian doctor urges unity among Jews, Arabs

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jews and Arabs are "cousins" and should resist all attempts to divide them, a Palestinian Arab doctor from Gaza said here recently in a heart to heart talk.

At the same time, Dr. Anton Shuhaibar said Jerusalem must be the capital of both Israel and Palestine, and acknowledged that fewer Palestinians believe in peace now than in 1993.

When he trained at an English hospital, Shuhaibar said he and a fellow trainee, an Egyptian Jewish doctor, agreed that if they ended up on opposite sides in a war they would rush to embrace, rather than fire a gun in anger.

He was appointed to the English hospital in the first place by a Jewish chief of staff.

"I feel the same way today," the otolaryngologist-in-chief at Shifa General Hospital, Gaza, told the Israel Affairs Committee at a breakfast meeting. "The Israeli doctors are our friends and are ready to help us."

There is an urgent need for upgrading the skills of Palestinian doctors and for the expertise of specialists at Mount Sinai Hospital, Toronto, and of hospitals in Israel.

This will be provided immediately, The CJN was told by Dr. Arnold Noyek, executive director, of the Toronto-based Isabel Silverman CISEPO program (Canada-International Scientific Exchange).

Four other CISEPO visiting-scholars from Gaza; Amman, Jordan; and Israel were introduced by Noyek as well as Rashad Saleh, Palestine House Canada chair, and Ziad Malawi, Canadian Arab Network president.

The union between Jews and Arabs is like a Catholic marriage and there can be no divorce, Shuhaibar said.

Asked if there was as much intense feeling for peace among Palestinians as among Israelis, he did not answer the question directly, but said the mood of Palestinians depends on day to day political events.

He believes that all doctors are healers, that medicine is above politics, and he now has a strong feeling that CISEPO is helping to achieve peace.

Security regulations imposed on Gaza under the Oslo peace treaty make it frustrating to have Israeli doctors come to his hospital, Shuhaibar said, and he called for an end to the isolation of Gaza.

"Between 1948 and the '60s, Palestinians who wanted peace were considered traitors, and now Israeli people who talk peace are considered traitors," he commented, sadly.

Shuhaibar built the ENT department at Shifa Hospital, which, among other things, treats infants and children for hearing loss, Noyek said.

That hospital now offers medical services to a million people in the Gaza strip, he said.

Trained at the medical school of the University of Cairo, Shuhaibar served as a doctor in the Gaza refugee camps and is a board member of the Greek Christian Church.

How others celebrate the miracle of lights

By JOYCE SINGER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — It's that zany time of year again. Time to whip up heaping plates of crispy golden latkes; get dressed up in our party best; fire up the Chanukiah; play spin the dreidel; and present holiday gifts and gelt to everyone in the house too young to vote. All this for eight entire days! And how do the luminaries celebrate Chanukah, the miracle of lights?

'Honest' Ed and Anne Mirvish sometimes find that travel commitments keep them away from home at Chanukah.

But this year, Ed happily reports, they will be home and able to celebrate with son David and his family.

"In our family, gifts are coming and going all the time. Chanukah is really a time for children and for a party. In recent years, the Chanukahs haven't been like the old days – regrettably," he says.

As a boy, he had a Jewish school upstairs from their grocery store. And they had a shul around the corner, where he had to say daily prayers.

"So we were brought up very Orthodox, but now I belong to the Orthodox, the Conservative and the Reform Temple. We don't take any chances, we're tuned in on all channels!"

Denny O'Neil (CHFI's Bob Magee) and Jeanne Beker (Fashion Television) celebrate most religious holidays where gift-giving is featured, kibbitzes O'Neil.

Married for nearly 12 years, with daughters Becky, 10, and Joey, 8, they celebrate the season with "the Chanukiah cookin', Santa Claus and all the traditions that were part of my childhood (Anglican) and Jeanne's (Jewish)."

This year they are planning to retreat to their country place in the Muskokas, with Bekker's mom Bronia and the children.

"Since we're both in the media, it's nice to have a quiet, family time. The kids get Chanukah gelt, and they play with the dreidel. Both kids really get into the lighting of the candles and Becky knows the prayers," O'Neil says.

Avinoam Silverman is a promising young dancer with the National Ballet Company of Canada. He is distinguishing himself in The Nutcracker this season, as an icicle attendant to the Snow Queen.

"When I was at the ballet school, the chef would make latkes for Chanukah," he remembers.

Silverman has been living here for the past four years, as practically the only Jewish member of the troupe, and certainly the only Israeli.

"My father was an American who made aliyah, and we were religious till I was about 11, when we became a secular family," Silverman says. "We still maintain some of the customs, like [saying] kiddush, but not all the 613 rules."

Is he homesick? "Of course, especially at holiday time, because it's a time for family. I also get homesick for Israel, because my roots are in that country."

Entertainer Michael Danso says that he and his wife Cyrel will be going up to BAYT, the Beth Avraham Yoseph Synagogue, to celebrate with friends.

"Afterwards," says Danso, "around midnight, we'll call Israel, to speak with our oldest son Adam, 28, our daughter-in-law and our two grandchildren."

Daughter Kim, 25, lives in Connecticut; son Jason, 22, is in Toronto. There will be gift-giving, and good friends invited for dinner.

"When you get together with family and friends and share a meal, you cement the family bonds and the feelings of kinship. That's what Chanukah really is for us."

Leading guitar maker receives Bronfman Award

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Canada's foremost guitar maker, William "Grit" Laskin, was recently presented with the annual $20,000 Saidye Bronfman Award, one of the largest individual arts prize in Canada, in a ceremony at the Art Gallery of Ontario.

This is the first time in the Saidye Bronfman Award's 21-year history that it has been given to a musical instrument maker. Previous recipients have included potters, fibre artists, glass artists, wood carvers and other artisans.

The award, established by the Samuel and Saidye Bronfman Family Foundation in honor of the late Saidye Bronfman's 80th birthday, recognizes the excellent work of an individual who has made a significant contribution to the development of crafts in Canada. It is presented by the Canada Council for the Arts and the Canadian Museum of Civilization. In addition to the cash award, works by the recipients are acquired by the museum for its permanent collection.

"Laskin has contributed to the centuries-old tradition of guitar making, not only by preserving time-honored techniques, but by adding to them with innovative solutions to technical challenges. He endows his instruments with a powerful visual presence imbued with wit and drama," the award statement noted.

William "Grit" Laskin

Laskin, who resides and maintains a studio in Toronto, has been building guitars for more than 26 years. He says that every guitar is different because each musician is different. He meets and talks extensively with his clients, and tailors the instruments to their individual needs.

His classical, flamenco and steel-string guitars are in demand throughout the world, and his waiting list of commissions extends to the year 2002. Players of his instruments include k.d. lang, Tom Chapin, Garnet Rogers and a host of other musicians. He also receives commissions from guitar making colleagues across Canada and the United States.

A many-faceted-artist, Laskin has used his engraved inlay art to take the tradition of musical instrument decoration beyond the purely decorative. For Laskin, the inlay medium has become a tool for communication, not merely embellishment.

In 1988, he co-founded and was twice president of the Association of Stringed Instrument Artisans (ASIA), the international organization for professional builders and repairers of musical instruments.

In 1995, he authored the first code of ethics for luthiers (makers of stringed musical instruments). The author of several books, his first novel, Angel Could Smell the Fire, was published in 1996.

Laskin is also an acclaimed musician/song writer/singer with three CDs and many live performances to his credit. He plays the guitar, mandolin, Northumbrian smallpipes and concertina.

In 1996, he launched the Borealis Recording Co. with three partners, in order to extend Canadian folk music to a wider public.

Laskin, who believes that of all the arts, music is the most direct and powerful route to our deepest emotions, says, "The very least I can do, as I spend my life nudging the guitar another small step closer to its apex, is to pass on to others what I am learning.

"The quest for sound is sweet and irresistible and never ending."

Memorial fund aids Jewish poor families

TORONTO — The Jewish community has a significant number of poor Jewish families that often get overlooked because of the misconception that Jews are rich, according to Gordon Wolfe, executive director of Jewish Family & Child Services (JF&CS).

Wolfe says approximately 12 percent of the Jewish population in Toronto is poor, a number comparable to that in the general population.

"Stereotypes can be a dangerous thing because many people assume the Jewish community is wealthy. Those who are poor often feel more ostracized from society than a non-Jewish counterpart would."

In 1985, Ruth Wattenberg Auslander died at age 54. Her husband Norman proposed to JF&CS that a new fund to help the poor be established in her name.

"Ruth was a mentsh – a genuine human being," says Norman Auslander. "She herself grew up in the poor Jewish 'ghettos' of Montreal, and always reached out to the poor in any way she could.

"Her untimely death was a devastating loss to her family and the community as a whole, and this was the one way felt I could keep her generosity and spirit alive."

Twelve years later, the Ruth Wattenberg Auslander Emergency Fund (RWAEF) continues to help poor Jewish families.

"The JF&CS receives funding to help subsidize the regular services provided by the agency, such as financial aid, counselling and more. The RWAEF is literally for the emergency needs of our clients that our regular funding can't cover, whether it be clothing, health care or courses for children with special requirements," says Wolfe.

In 1993, the Auslander family held a Fantasy Auction to raise money for the fund.

"It was an unconventional venture for the JF&CS to support," says Auslander. "Usually the agency is responsible for allocation of resources, but in this case, they allowed us to do our own fundraising event."

The family raised nearly $23,000 that evening, which helped the fund continue through the '90s.

Under the auspices of the JF&CS, the fund has been able to continue to grow slowly, but the agency must be very selective in its allocations.

"If more people knew about what this fund can do, I'm sure we'd receive donations from more than those who knew Ruth, although she did touch an unbelievable number of people," Wolfe says. "To truly fulfil the vision upon which the RWAEF was founded, we need more community support."

Dry Bones
THE REAL MIRACLE OF CHANUKKAH
...IS NOT THAT THE LIGHT LASTED FOR EIGHT NIGHTS.
THE REAL MIRACLE IS THAT THE LIGHT HAS LASTED FOR MORE THAN TWO THOUSAND YEARS!

Always on the edge

In Jerusalem, where this editorial is being written, the air crackles with an unceasing cacophonous staccato of sounds and sighs, myriad affirmations and reminders of life lived here intensely, vigorously, almost always "on the edge" of emotional drama.

Ubiquitous on any of the city's main streets are the pounding of jackhammers, the revving engines of large diesel buses, loud volumes of radios from the rolled-down windows of cars driving by, vendors at full voice hawking their goods, the frequent chirping of cellular phones, and the constant impatient, intemperate honking of every conceivable car horn.

Perhaps because it is winter, and it is chilly and rain is falling, people literally run their lives here at fast, aggressive paces.

Each day brings a number of news stories, any one of which, in "slower-paced" places, would halt traffic. But not here. Here, traffic zooms. In Jerusalem, these stories are part of the electricity charging the air.

For example, a sampling of only one day's stories in the middle of last week, brought forth the following three items:

• Minister of Defence Yitzhak Mordechai submitted a West Bank redeployment map based on his views of Israel's "security interests." In it, 42 out of 144 Jewish settlements in the West Bank are omitted from Israeli sovereignty. Not surprisingly, it has become a major issue of debate.

• Internal Security Minister Avigdor Kahalani reported that so far this year, 43,371 cars had been stolen in Israel. This figure is up 25 percent from the entire total last year of 34,600 cars reported stolen.

• A poll of 1,180 Palestinians, conducted last month by the Jerusalem Media and Communications Centre, showed that 17.3 percent of those polled supported Hamas, compared to 11.3 percent in July.

But people here do not "run" fast because of the news alone. They do so, in part, because of the urgency to live, which is so much more apparent in Jerusalem.

On the very same day as these stories appeared in print, so too did the following three items of news.

• At the end of an unprecedented meeting in Cairo with the Ashkenazi chief rabbi of Israel, Yisrael Lau, one of the most important Sunni Muslim leaders in the Arab world, Sheikh Mohammed Al Tantawi "fiercely condemned terrorism that targets innocent people."

• Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, Labor leader Ehud Barak and other public figures signed a social policy pact called Peace in Israel. The pact was initiated by the newly opened Nachshon Heritage, Tolerance and Understanding Centre, named after Nachshon Wachsman, the young IDF soldier kidnapped and killed by Palestinian terrorists.

• In the same poll conducted by the Jerusalem Media and Communications Centre, 74.2 percent of Palestinians polled supported the peace process, as opposed to 58.7 percent in July.

It is not a Pollyanna exercise to put the latter three reports alongside the former. Rather it is an exercise in drawing a fuller, richer truth about the air at the "edges" of life where people live in Jerusalem in December 1997.

As this is the last editorial of 1997, it is important that we know.

Latimer decision to end life was arrogant

Your editorial condemning the inappropriate sentence meted out to Robert Latimer is right on. (CJN, Dec. 11)

As the father of a disabled daughter, I am troubled by the decision of Mr. Justice G.E. (Ted) Noble. Upon his appointment, Noble took an oath to uphold the laws of Canada – not to respond to public opinion nor to groups and organizations with their own agenda. If mercy killings are to be permitted in our society, that is for Parliament to enact. A judge's role is to interpret and apply the law, but not to make it.

While one can sympathize with the anguish of the Latimer family in raising a severely disabled child, there can be no moral nor legal justification for Latimer's vigilante form of justice. There are in this country many agencies willing and able to care for children like Tracy Latimer. Again, as happens all too frequently, little or no regard is given to the rights of the victim. It is arrogance in the ultimate degree for those of us blessed with no mental nor physical disabilities to purport to determine the worth and value of a life of someone less fortunate than we are. We have no right to assume that if the quality of life of a disabled person is less than our standard, then we have some God given right to terminate that being.

Noble concluded that a mandatory sentence with prolonged imprisonment would have caused hardship for Latimer's family. Is that not the case for any convicted murder with a wife and children?

We live in a copycat society and one can only hope that an appellant court will right this wrong and send out a message that all Canadians, whether disabled or not, are judged by the same standard of justice.

Rabbi Stern drives wedge between community members

Rabbi Stern's letter (CJN, Dec. 4) condemning Reform Jewish practices and the controversy surrounding the conversion bill is both inaccurate and misinformed. I find the rabbi's innuendoes to be damaging and not in the interest of unity. Although Rabbi Stern preaches unity and brotherhood among all Jews to his congregation, he contradicts himself in his letter to the Jewish community in The CJN. His contempt of liberal Jewish policies is very evident and I find his comments to be self-serving at best. This only places a deeper wedge between us than the one that already exists. I would argue with the rabbi that it will not only be the Orthodox who will mend the world, but rather that tikkun olam can only result from the unity that must be found throughout the entire Jewish community.

It is time to put aside our individual prejudices and concentrate on the real issue at hand. The conversion bill has nothing to do with who is a Jew but rather with who is a rabbi. This digs deep into the heart and soul of our being as practising Jews. I have been taught not to judge how others choose to pray; however, it seems to be the incessant criticism from the right that stands in judgment of all others. The vast majority of North American Jews have chosen to adopt a liberal method of practice. This is not abandoning tradition, but rather it is embracing it in the context of modern day thinking. We must be left to consider our own sense of spirituality and not have it dictated to us from the right. It has been said that the problems in Israel will not be solved there, but rather in the Diaspora. To this I agree; however, if we continue to fight as undisciplined siblings, not only will these disagreements not go away, I fear that the future of the Jewish community will prove to be a very trying one. To Rabbi Stern I simply say, try to accept all Jews as they are and stop passing judgment.

Soap made from Shoah victims

We're much disturbed by Sol Littman and Prof. Jacques Kornberg's statement (CJN, Oct. 9) that there is no proof that human remains were used by Nazis to make soap. The undersigned persons are living witnesses of the opposite.

In Theresienstadt/Terezin concentration camp, in February 1945, our group asked for soap and we received it. They looked like ordinary soap bars of a yellowish appearance, about 7.5 cm x 5 cm. The letters RJF and 5 or 6 digits were on them, meaning Reine Juden Fett (pure Jewish fat). They didn't give the usual suds. Later, realizing what these were, we gave them back.

I remember the Hungarian fascists' expression in 1943: "You will be nice soap," when they saw a fat Jewish person. So they knew about it.

Persons who served the Hungarian army as Jewish slave workers had the same experience in Russia.

Chanukah lights symbolize Jewish miracles

By SORIN FINCHELSTEIN

"How does this night differ from any other night?" is the question that Jews have asked on every seder night for hundreds of generations. However, for millions of Jews born and raised within what was once known as the Pale of Settlement, there is another day that holds an equally major significance – the day they left their native land and were thus again "freed from bondage," this time on an individual basis.

The moment of those people's second delivery, however joyful, saw many of them undergoing a thorough and sometimes painful scrutiny with regard to their identity as Jews. For if, a century ago east European Jewry could be regarded as a fairly homogenous entity, that assertion gradually lost its validity, as major historical events such as the Russian revolution, the Holocaust and the birth of the Jewish state came to shatter its contention. Since the geographical area to which we refer was, for more than four decades, ruled by authoritarian Communist regimes, the latter played a consequential role in the way their Jewish subjects perceived and defined themselves.

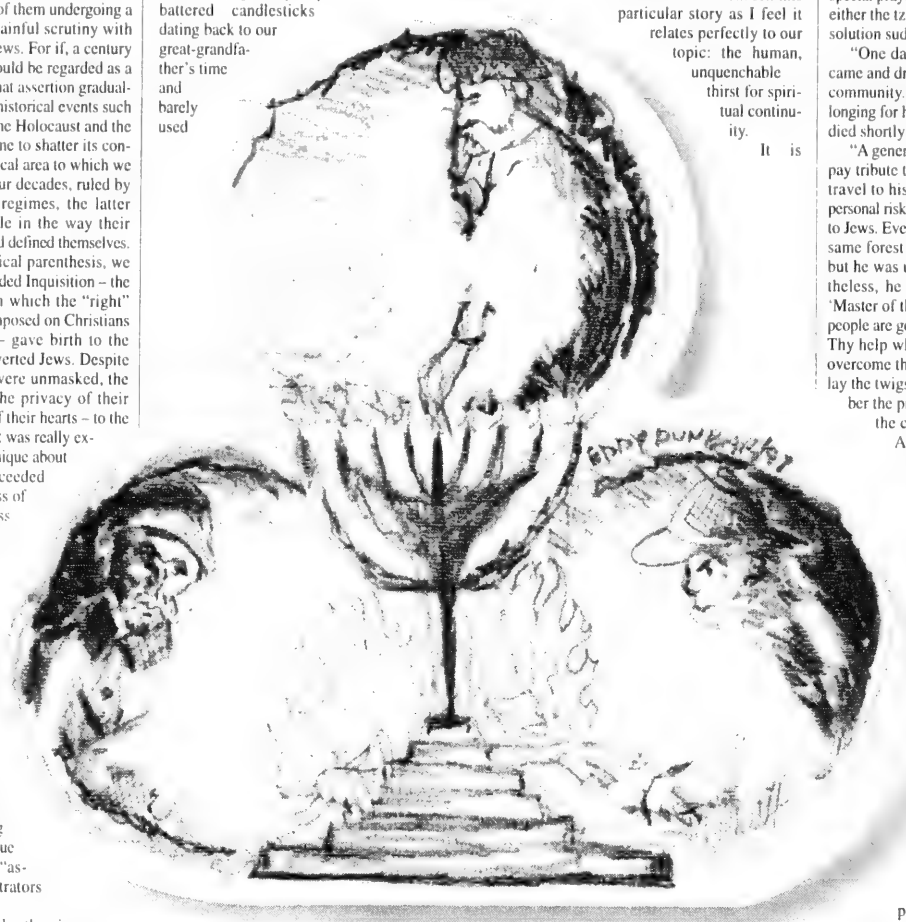
To venture into a historical parenthesis, we may remember that the dreaded Inquisition – the bloody instrument through which the "right" blend of Christianity was imposed on Christians and non-Christians alike – gave birth to the Marranos, the forcibly converted Jews. Despite of the capital risk if they were unmasked, the Marranos stuck – within the privacy of their families and in the bottom of their hearts – to the faith of their ancestors. What was really extraordinary and absolutely unique about them was the way they succeeded in preserving their awareness of being Jewish, an awareness which was quietly transmitted from generation, to generation, for hundreds of years.

Five centuries later, by alternating brutal policies with more subtle means, Communist regimes in eastern Europe were more successful in this regard, as they needed only a few decades to alienate from Judaism a sizeable segment of their Jewish subjects. The code word used by watchdog groups to describe the technique and the policy involved is "assimilation," while its perpetrators settled for "integration."

We must admit that, under the circumstances, there were indeed Jewish people who, for idealistic or practical reasons, did believe in the necessity of becoming "integrated" and consequently, were willing to shed their "ethnic ballast."

Ironically, the major obstacle in achieving integration proved not to lie with those Jews but ultimately with the very environment which allegedly was to absorb them. For the process of so-called "integration," while depriving the targeted people of their spiritual roots, did not prevent them from being still persecuted as Jews. The subjects of this failed social experiment affecting two, three, or sometimes four consecutive generations were thus left alone in an emotional no-man's land, to be continuously haunted by a painful sentiment of spiritual void.

These lines are aimed precisely at those of you who have known for years that you were Jewish, yet, aside from the feeling of being different and the clear perception of your being treated in a different way, were never really able to identify or to pinpoint that difference. Consequently, your awareness of being Jewish did not come from within, but developed mainly as a reaction to the way you were regarded from without. I, personally, can relate to you, for I also belonged to this particular group of spiritually uprooted Jews. We are indeed a quaint lot who – sometimes despite our wishes, sometimes unbeknown to us – grew up as apikorskim, not through our own fault, but rather by default. For many of us, being Jewish amounted to no more than a family name gentiles saw as being funny; a pair of battered candlesticks dating back to our great-grandfather's time and barely used since; and a frail, once-white, now-yellowish antique prayer shawl disintegrating at the bottom of a seldom opened drawer.



By an unfortunate concurrence of certain historical developments, we were denied for decades true access to our Jewish spiritual inheritance, this loss being definitely etched in our inner structure. Miraculously, we now have the opportunity to put the past behind us. What we all should be aware of is that, along with this opportunity, we also have an important privilege, as we can finally reach out towards, and draw strength from, the everlasting fountain of Judaism.

In this regard, I urge you to see Judaism, not as a petrified set of rules and regulations, but as a most vivid and colorful rainbow of choices which present themselves to you. As a Jew, you are the follower of a faith and a life philosophy, which, as one of our sages put it, does not extol perfection but perfectibility. This distinction, however subtle it might seem, emphasizes the fact that, regardless of the religious, philosophical or political beliefs we might hold, we are first and foremost human beings. This quality demands our engaging in a permanent quest to improve ourselves at both an individual and a community level.

It may be the first time you celebrate Chanukah, the Festival of Lights. Traditionally, every Chanukah night should be concluded with a meaningful story. In keeping with the tradition, I would like to share with you a short but exquisite tale, a veritable jewel pertaining to the immensely rich Jewish lore. I have chosen this particular story as I feel it relates perfectly to our topic: the human, unquenchable thirst for spiritual continuity.

It is said that once upon a time, an old Jew came to see the wise Breslauer Rabbi. "Rebbe," the man said, "all my life, I have worked hard to provide for my family, I have prayed to our God, kept the holy Shabbat and lived according to what the Holy Book teaches us. Now, as I'm nearing the end of my earthly wandering, I'm asking you only one thing: You who are so learned and so righteous, can you perform a miracle, so I can see it? I'm not asking for a great miracle, like the parting of the sea or manna falling from heaven, but for only a small one, just enough to convince me that my life was worth living."

The wise rabbi looked at him, nodded his head, caressed his beard, and taking a deep sigh, said, "I'm going to tell you a story that my grandfather – may he rest in peace – told me as a child. It is a story which will hopefully satisfy your request. A very long, long time ago, not far away from here, but not close either, at the edge of the majestic Russian forest, there lived a very old and most revered Jew, by the name of Yankel. People from far away would come to seek his advice or just to marvel at his wisdom. For Yankel had devoted his whole life to studying the holy Torah and passing his knowledge to the young. Aside from that, the venerable patriarch enjoyed taking long walks through the forest of which he was so fond. It is said that whenever he was faced with a problem going beyond his powers and thus into the Almighty's, Yankel would head towards a certain clearing in the woods; light a fire, arranging the twigs in a certain pattern; and utter a special prayer. And the miracle always happened: either the tzuris went away by themselves or the solution suddenly became apparent.

"One day, though, the soldiers of the Czar came and drove him away, along with his whole community. Deeply saddened and sickened, and longing for his beloved forest, the embittered man died shortly after.

"A generation later, Yankel's son, wanting to pay tribute to his father's memory, undertook to travel to his native village. He did it at a great personal risk, since that area was by then off-limits to Jews. Eventually, Yankel's son entered the very same forest and wandered through it for hours, but he was unable to find the old glade. Nevertheless, he ardently called on the Almighty: 'Master of the Universe, please do hear me! My people are going through hard times and it is only Thy help which may give them the strength to overcome this hardship! I, myself, know how to lay the twigs and how to light the fire; I remember the prayer by heart, yet I just cannot spot the clearing my father used to pray in.' And the miracle…the miracle happened again.

"In his turn, another generation later and in similar circumstances, Yankel's grandson would not even attempt to travel to the old village, but he pleaded, 'Oh, God of Israel, Thou must help me! For neither am I able to reach that place in the forest, nor do I know how to light the fire; yet, I still remember the prayer.' And even then, the miracle happened.

"By the time Yankel's great-grandson had become the most respected elder of his village, they had been forced to move to yet another place. One day, he learned that a terrible thing was in the making, a thing of which his people were unaware and for which they were completely unprepared. Therefore, Yankel's great-grandson turned towards the Almighty to seek help. 'Lord of the Universe,' he uttered, 'it is with great hope that I pray to Thee, but also with great humility! For lost is all the means my ancestors used to reach Thee. I cannot light the fire, as I do not know how to lay the twigs. My great-grandfather's place in the forest is hundreds of miles away and impossible for me to find. Further still, I don't remember the all-powerful prayer. The only thing I do remember is the story!'

"For our Lord, in his immense kindness, this was enough and the miracle happened again. For the glade in the forest and the fire and the prayer and, of course, the story, one carries them all in one's soul. And this is, in itself, a true miracle!"

Upon lighting your first Chanukah candle, I would like you to remember that miracles do happen and that you can indeed be part of them.

National service — a national obligation

The recent proposal by Israeli opposition leader Ehud Barak for compulsory national service for all Israelis has reopened a public debate on a festering social problem. Barak was referring to Israeli Arabs and haredi yeshivah students – two groups exempt from compulsory military service.

By Shira Herzog in Toronto

In the case of the Arabs, the exemption is both voluntary and forced. Historically, there has been a concern that Arabs serving in the army may pose a security threat. The Arabs, in turn, did not want to serve in the army for fear that in the event of war, they might find themselves taking up arms against their blood relatives on the other side of the border. In spite of this, the Druze and the Bedouin have accepted the responsibility of military service, and they are among the bravest fighters in the IDF.

The case of the Orthodox yeshivah students dates back to the early years of the state. In the aftermath of the decimation of centres of Jewish learning in Europe during the Holocaust, David Ben-Gurion agreed to the request of the Agudat Yisrael party to exempt yeshivah students from military service. At the time, they numbered only a few hundred, and the stated goal was to allow for the development of a new generation of Torah scholars.

Ben-Gurion had no way of knowing how this story would unfold. The reluctance to serve today has little to do with any religious prohibition to fight in the army. On the contrary, the obligation to defend one's people is a religious commandment. Thousands of religious soldiers serve in the IDF in all capacities, and many combine yeshivah studies with service in elite combat units. For those who request the exemption, it represents another effort to distance themselves from the mainstream of Israeli society and its influences. Their numbers have swelled, and the estimates of those currently exempted from service range close to 200,000.

There is an additional, insidious effect of this phenomenon. Virtually all of these students are on the Israeli equivalent of welfare. As long as they are studying in yeshivah, they cannot be drafted. If they step out into the workplace, they will be eligible for the draft. Many of them have large families living, in effect, below the poverty line, at a huge cost to the state.

In a country where military service is still a necessary fact of life, the exemption for able-bodied young men en masse has resulted in a deep-seated resentment of their special status. When approximately seven percent of eligible recruits from an identifiable group request the exemption in any given year, the numbers are too large to be ignored.

Any attempts to open a debate on the question have been quashed by the haredi parties. They seem to prefer their constituency under their influence, dependent on the dole and on the state allocations that they can control. Over the last few weeks, two new proposals have been made. Finance Minister Ya'acov Ne'eman, himself observant, proposed a "workfare" program for the yeshivah students, without any impact on their military exemption. His concern is the cost to the state of the subsidies to these students and their families.

More recently, Barak proposed compulsory national service for all Israeli citizens, in their own community. In this way, Barak seeks to neutralize the social objection to service, since the Orthodox students can serve "at home," without actually being conscripted. In the Knesset, Yossi Beilin of the Labor party is drafting a private member's bill in support of the Barak initiative.

To date, the haredi politicians have been unanimous in their opposition to these initiatives. Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has also stated his opposition – obviously for reasons of political expediency and coalition politics. But the issue will not go away. As long as Israel has a compulsory draft, the inequity of the current system and the growing numbers affected will keep it alive. National service for yeshivah students and Arabs would level the playing field and would also make it easier for members of these groups to qualify for the benefits available to Israeli veterans. It would remove the sting from one of the most acute divides and points of tension in Israel's social fabric and would make it impossible to argue that the national burden is unevenly shouldered.

At the same time, in an important development in the "demilitarization" of Israeli society, it would give the same weight to service to the community in a civilian capacity as it does to active military service. This is an idea whose time has come. It deserves a serious debate on its merits.

Florida, a visitor's diary

Five November days in sunny Florida – a family occasion and a lecture – caused me to fill my mental diary with things both familiar and different.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

First, the weather. When I add up all the sunny periods, they amount to a total of about one hour. The rest was rain, clouds, warm temperatures and humidity of 99 percent, while television brought me news of snow back home.

The shul we went to was Conservative, the crowd large and the rabbi's drashah very good indeed. It was the Torah portion Chayye Sarah, which deals with the death and burial of our matriarch, Sarah. The rabbi spoke about the way in which we comfort mourners. He was critical of many people's attempt to make the mourners "forget" their troubles. True comfort, he emphasized, lies in letting them know how much we cherished the deceased, how much we feel for and with the mourners, and how gratefully we remember the dead.

Even the speech of one young lady who celebrated her bat mitzvah was memorable. In essence, she said that she would try to do her part in securing the survival of Judaism and therefore would look for a Jewish husband so that her family could be brought up in the traditional way. I have heard a few speeches from 13-year-old scholars in my life, but this was the first time I ever heard anyone say that her/his marriage partner would have to be Jewish. Young people quite obviously can think very grown-up thoughts.

I left the synagogue briefly between the Torah service and Musaf. I noticed that in faraway Florida they have faithfully imitated the northern custom (or is it the other way around?) that causes young people to leave the sanctuary as soon as their friend has finished his/her "performance;" they then skip the rest of the service, talking or running around and waiting for the time when they can return to the real thing, the reception.

Toronto synagogues are not immune to this disheartening display that makes it all too clear that these young people's attendance at the service has nothing whatsoever to do with religion.

But I was happy to find that even in the southern fairyland, there are serious attempts to bring up a new and duty-conscious generation. Jewish day schools are proliferating and so are adult study groups – a heartening phenomenon.

This trip had also an important personal meaning for me: the young lady who spoke about the desire to obtain a Jewish husband at some time in the future, was the child of a cousin. And at the synagogue, where I gave a lecture, a woman came to me and informed me that her mother, who lived in Florida, had known me as a child back in Berlin. I subsequently phoned the mother and she was indeed someone I remember. She had been in the orphanage of which my dad and my mother were directors. She is my age and I had not thought of her for all these years – and this discontinuity of memory is another aspect of the scourge the Nazis wrought.

It is quite obvious that a trip south may cause one to encounter the strange and the familiar. Happy Chanukah!

Jews, culturally sensitive services and Israel

Metropolis is the name of an ambitious joint venture of Citizenship and Immigration Canada and the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council. In cooperation with Canadian universities, it has created four Centres of Excellence in Canada dealing with research on the issue of immigrant integration, from an urban perspective.

By Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

One of the major concerns of current research on immigrant and minority communities, as seen in the program of the Metropolis centres, is the provision of culturally sensitive health and social services. It is generally accepted that cultural communities have some needs that are best served using a combination or selection of ethnospecific institutions, same-group professionals and/or culturally appropriate approaches.

Jewish communities were pioneers in this area, well before it became fashionable. The Jewish Diaspora tradition of self-government and communal welfare obligations played a role. So did anti-Semitism. The "Jewish" hospitals are a case in point. Initially they were founded in response to discrimination or insensitivity to Jewish doctors and patients. But they also were places of obvious cultural familiarity for Jewish patients. Kosher food is just one of many elements.

Different culures bring to the issues of health and social adjustment a wide variety of concerns. Language plays a part. But so do basic cultural values, attitudes, rituals and customs. These can have an impact on things like the accuracy of diagnoses, optimal treatments, patient compliance and doctor-patient relations. When people are vulnerable they find particular comfort in the familiar and the non-threatening.

Just about any area of medicine needs to be concerned with cultural sensitivity. Even seemingly routine health problems can be rendered complex by cultural variables. This is even more the case for issues like terminal illnesses; or mental health, psychological and psychiatric problems, especially those involving families. Many immigrant and ethnic communities in Canada would love to have the same range of resources available to meet their health and social service needs, as does the Jewish community. From day-care to geriatric facilities, Jewish needs are met in culturally sensitive ways.

There is another way in which the Metropolis Project has a Jewish angle. Apart from the work of the four Centres of Excellence and a national research effort, there is an international component to Metropolis involving at least 14 countries. For some time, Canada has been seen as a leader in inter-group relations, with our multiculturalism recognized as an efficient, fair and civil approach to dealing with diversity. At the same time, many countries recognized that immigration was becoming an international phenomenon and cities were facing similar problems of immigrant integration.

I was fortunate to be able to help the Canadian founders of the international project include Israel as an indispensable partner country. If there is one policy area in which Israelis have a long track record and significant expertise, it is the integration of immigrants. Israel has been involved in Metropolis from the start. Moreover, the third international Metropolis conference is scheduled for Jerusalem next year.

Israel's recent task of integrating hundreds of thousands of Russian immigrants in a few years is one of the most amazing feats of recent immigration history. While far from perfect, the challenge and the creativity of the exercise have been enormous.

It is always difficult to know how one country or society or group can borrow from the success of another to solve its problems. It is true for minority groups in North America seeking to access culturally sensitive services and build ethno-specific institutions as Jewish communities did. It is true for European countries seeking to emulate elements of Canadian multicultural policy. And it would also be true of nations seeking to copy lessons on immigrant absorption from the Israeli experience.

Making a carbon copy will rarely work. Ideally, studying and learning from the experiences of others can give us new insights, new approaches, which we can graft to our own particular problems. In the area of immigrant services and immigrant absorption, both Jewish communities and Israel have a great deal to offer.

taste and occasion...

Jerusalem has always been a source of strife. British historian Martin Gilbert elucidates on this theme in Jerusalem in the Twentieth Century (Random House), a fastidious portrait of a politically and religiously divided city.

Karen Armstrong's complementary volume, Jerusalem, One City, Three Faiths (Ballantine Books), plumbs the roots of the disputes which have riven Jerusalem since antiquity.

This past year marked the centenary of the first Zionist Congress in Basel. In The Zionist Ideology (University Press of New England), Israeli scholar Gideon Shimoni masterfully traces the origins of Zionism in all its multifaceted forms.

Since the late 1980s, a group of revisionist historians, led by Benny Morris and Avi Shlaim, have debunked the standard Zionist narrative. Efraim Karsh sharply disagrees with their iconoclastic views, and in Fabricating Israeli History (Frank Cass), he sets out his case. As you can imagine, the sparks fly.

Amos Elon, a distinguished Israeli journalist, has covered the Middle East for more than three decades, impressing readers with his erudition and evenhandedness. These qualities are abundantly present in A Blood-Dimmed Tide (Columbia University Press), an anthology of his dispatches anchored by an incisive introductory essay.

The politics of the Middle East are notoriously convoluted. Guide to the Middle East (HarperCollins), put out by the Times of London, helps place the issues in their proper perspective.

Bernard Lewis' book, The Middle East (Scribner), is magisterial in scope. Writing with authoritative ease, he lucidly looks back at 2,000 years of turbulent history.

Israel celebrates its 50th anniversary next year, and Dawn of the Promised Land (Stoddart), by Ben Wicks, movingly chronicles the founding of the state through the triumphs and disappointments of the first Jewish immigrants.

The rapprochement between Israel and the PLO, culminating with the Oslo accords, is the subject of David Makovsky's Making Peace with the PLO (Westview Press), a work combining dogged reporting, rigorous analysis and psychological insights.

As Israel's third chief justice, Shimon Agranat, born and raised in the United States, played an integral role in its social, political and religious controversies. In Judgment in Jerusalem (University of California Press), Pnina Lahav provides a sober profile of an upstanding man and a balanced assessment of his contributions to Israeli jurisprudence.

If you're seriously considering aliyah, consult The Pocket Book Shaliach (Gefen) before you plunge ahead. Ephraim Bluth's sensible, user-friendly guide steers prospective olim in the right directions.

Prism of 26 nostalgic essays

Jews from eastern Europe changed the complexion and tone of Canada's modern Jewish community. Growing up Jewish (McClelland & Stewart) charts this metamorphosis through the prism of 26 nostalgic essays written by the descendants of these immigrants.

Decades after his death, the power of A.M. Klein's poetry still resonates, as you will see by reading Selected Poems (University of Toronto Press).

More than 500,000 Jews left the Soviet Union between 1967 and 1990. The majority were able to emigrate thanks to Holland's assistance. This mass movement is rigorously examined by Petrus Buwalda, Holland's former ambassador in Moscow. His book, They Did Not Dwell Alone (Wood Wilson Centre Press and John Hopkins University Press), sheds new light on the exodus.

The Slepak family personifies the struggle of Soviet Jewry. In the paperback edition of The Gates of November (Alfred Knopf), American novelist Chaim Potok turns to non-fiction to produce a stirring account of one family's battle to assert their Jewishness and their right to emigrate in the face of Communist opposition.

Russian intellectuals who reached the United States between the 1880s and the 1920s enriched the country. Among them were Abraham Cahan, the editor of The Jewish Daily Forward, and Chaim Zhitlovsky, the Yiddishist. To the Other Shore (Princeton University Press), by Steven Cassedy, perceptively assesses their ideas and contributions.

Hank Rubin, a 22-year-old Jewish pre-med student from Los Angeles, volunteered for the Republican side as a medic during the Spanish civil war. His vivid memoir, Spain's Cause Was Mine (Southern Illinois University Press), is a microcosm of the fervor which fired the passions of the idealists who joined the fabled Abraham Lincoln Brigade.

The saga of American Jewry unfolds in several fine books. Tradition Transformed (Johns Hopkins University Press), by Gerald Sorin, postulates the theory that acculturation, not assimilation, best describes the Jewish experience in America. Everything You Need To Know About America's Jews (Penguin), by Roy Rosenberg, is a good introduction to the subject.

Beth Wenger's New York Jews and the Great Depression (Yale University Press) skilfully focuses on the crisis of faith which gripped and shaped a community. Howard Markel's Quarantine! East European Jewish Immigrants and the New York City Epidemic of 1892 (Johns Hopkins University Press) extracts a contemporary message from a long-forgotten event. Kenneth Silverman's biography, Houdini!!! (HarperCollins), illuminates the life and times of Ehrich Weiss, the legendary illusionist and son of a rabbi.

Bronfman writes sequel

About a year ago, Edgar Bronfman, president of the World Jewish Congress and chair of the Seagram Company, wrote The Making of a Jew. Now he is back again with another revealing and high-spirited sequel, Good Spirits: The Making of a Businessman (Putnam), in which he portrays his achievements as a tycoon.

In Science, Jews and Secular Culture (Princeton University Press), David Hollinger demonstrates, albeit in turgid fashion, how Jews broke the anti-Semitic barriers which had kept them from fully participating in American intellectual pursuits.

How did science affect Jews from the 18th century to the present? The answers may be found in the essays in The Interaction of Scientific and Jewish Cultures in Modern Times (Edwin Mellen Press), edited by Yakov Rabkin and Ira Robinson.

Allen Ginsberg: Selected Poems 1947-1995 (HarperCollins) showcases the late, great Jewish poet.

Yehuda Amichai, arguably, is Israel's most eminent living poet, and in The Selected Poetry of Yehuda Amichai (University of California Press) his prowess shines.

For a country its size, Israel has produced a disproportionate number of internationally renowned writers, from Aharon Appelfeld and David Grossman to Amos Oz and A.B. Yehoshua. The Oxford Book of Hebrew Short Stories (Oxford University Press), edited by Glenda Abramson, celebrates their talents.

Yiddish culture is filled with parables and allegories, all rooted in Eastern Europe. They're conveniently collected in Yiddish Folktales (Random House), edited by Beatrice Silverman Weinreich.

War has scarred the universe. Charles Messenger's The Century of Warfare (HarperCollins) lists every armed conflict of the past 100 years, including the wars in the Middle East.

Rabbinic Reflections

Light of Chanukah is life's compass

By RABBI AARON FLANZRAICH

I remember when I lived in Israel, I went to Jerusalem for Shavuot. As many know, it is an age-old custom to stay up all night and study as our ancestors did many thousands of years ago at the foot of Mount Sinai. So I pushed myself away from the dinner table and went outside to make my way towards the Old City.

Up I went on the legendary Rechov HaTzanchanim – the path Israeli paratroopers took in their conquest of Jerusalem. The road took a strange turn and as I walked, everything seemed pitch black. There were no stars, no moon, no lights or cars. Just complete and total blackness.

For a moment I stepped back and looked at the darkness. I took a deep breath of the cold, damp Jerusalem air. Then I walked a few more steps and saw the warm, bright glow of the ancient city's walls. I felt as if I had come home. The light entered me and carried me to where I wanted to go.

The menorah of Chanukah is no different. It is a great compass to find our way through life. When we look at the menorah, we see the branches and remember the miracle. But the shammas, the light that lights the other candles, was never on the Temple's menorah. It was never on the earliest menorahs. It was only with time, and deep thought, that a shammas became the ninth and final member of the menorah family. The question is: Why do we have it?

In rabbinic fashion, I'll answer with another question: What's more important on Chanukah, lighting the menorah or having the light? As we observe the festival of Chanukah, is it the lighting of the menorah or the burning of its lights that is most significant?

Before I start to answer, let me remind you this is not just about Chanukah and a menorah. This is also about life, about seeing the light, carrying the torch and not just setting fires.

Many years ago, a gentleman came to the late Lubavitcher Rebbe, who knew the man because he was a longtime teacher in one of the chassidic cheders. The man was sad and depressed and he came to the Rebbe for help: "Rebbe, I can no longer teach the children."

"Oh, why is that?" the Rebbe asked.

"As you know, I am a survivor of the Holocaust. Every day when I get up, I cannot stop thinking about the lives of all the children who never had the opportunities and happiness that these children here have. I think about all of the lost lives and horror, and I cannot go on. It hurts far too much."

The Rebbe listened patiently, hearing this man's dark pain. "You may be right, my friend. But remember that we are workers of light, and our job is to push away the darkness in our lives and the world. It is your teaching that brings light to the world."

The man returned to his job and never left it.

Light is an eternal reminder of the good and the pure. Light is a symbol of strength; it is an icon that teaches us that the bad can be pushed back. Light teaches that we can win the war against the darkness to make this world a less confusing place. I believe that the most significant part of Chanukah is seeing the light, not merely lighting the candles.

This year, as Chanukah falls at the end of December, there is a clear danger in its message. The growing temptation is to see Chanukah as the Jewish alternative to other winter holidays. But Chanukah is precisely about defeating those temptations and proudly carrying forth a Jewish message to life.

That is what the shammas does; it gives the light that others draw from.

Yet, if all we do is light the candles and don't become any different, then the light was not bright enough, nor did it do enough. What we are really doing on Chanukah is not merely lighting the candles; that was done thousands of years ago by our Maccabean brothers. What we are doing now is carrying their light.

Biz & Halachah

Overcharging not allowed

By RABBI JAY KELMAN

In a pure free-market economy, prices are determined solely by supply and demand. Business charges what the market will bear, which will in turn be determined by the consumers' willingness to pay. What constraints, if any, does Jewish law (Halachah) place on the free market mechanism to determine price?

It is clear that Halachah does not allow one to take monetary advantage of anyone, even though that person is willing to pay above-market prices. This is seen in the ruling in the Talmud regarding a fleeing fugitive who agrees to pay an exorbitant price to a ferryman to take him across the river. While there is no doubt that the fugitive would pay any amount, his claim that he had no alternative is heeded and a refund of the excess fee is granted.

Jewish law also allows for redress, even when the overpricing is not exorbitant. The laws of Ona'ah (price fraud) allow a defrauded party to nullify the transaction if the price diverges from the established market norm by more than one-sixth. Even signing a general waiver form does not preclude an Ona'ah claim, unless the waiver specifies the actual market price and the amount of the overcharge.

It is not easy, especially in our sophisticated economy, to determine one actual price. In fact, the market price may be a range of values. People are willing to pay for such factors as convenience, service, product display and decor. Thus, it is reasonable to expect that the same item can sell in two different stores at different prices. Therefore, no legal redress is available when the Ona'ah is less than one-sixth.

The above notwithstanding, many authorities rule that when a single market price is readily determined, such as for basic food commodities, one may not charge an amount that differs at all from the prevailing norm.

With certain items, market price is not fixed, but is determined by the negotiations of the parties involved. Often it is the subjective value that one places on the object, rather than objective criteria, which determine the price. Hence, artwork, a patent invention or even Maftir Yonah can be sold to the highest bidder. The highest bid then determines market value.

Real estate transactions seem to offer a combination of objective and subjective factors in determining price. On the one hand, the house is worth what you can get for it and buyers will often pay extra for a house they want. On the other hand, prices for a typical house of a certain size are routinely published in the newspaper and those prices would represent the market norm. Because of the difficulty in assessing the proper Ona'ah claim, coupled with the fact that the buyer receives land, which is enduring in nature, the Halachah states that claims of Ona'ah are not actionable for a real estate transaction though it may be morally wrong to enter into such a transaction.

In the area of basic necessities such as food and rent, rabbinical law established a (net) profit limitation of one-sixth. This limitation notwithstanding, vendors are allowed to sell at current market prices. In reality today, the profit margin at most supermarkets is much less than one-sixth. As economic conditions change, the Jewish court has the authority to regulate prices at different levels of profit to ensure the efficiency of the economy as a whole, while striking a balance between costs to the consumer and a fair profit for the business person.

Underlying the laws of the Ona'ah is the communal responsibility to make available to the public information regarding market norms, so that business can be conducted on a level playing field.

A most curious personality

Two Gun Cohen: A Biography by Daniel S. Levy (St. Martin's Press, $37.99).

When I was a teenager growing up in Brooklyn, N.Y., I heard mention of a colorful personality called Two-Gun Cohen, a general in the Chinese army. In my youthful imagination, I conjured up a romantic image of an intrepid adventure in an exotic land.

Daniel Levy's biography reveals that Morris Abraham Cohen was even more astonishing in his exploits and many-sided life than I had imagined.

Born in the east end of London in 1887 — a place of squalor, dirt and oppression — the youthful Cohen soon turned into a tough brawler and petty criminal. When he was 16, his parents decided to send their wayward son to Canada. "It was seen as a country where faithful men and pious women turned the wilderness into a land of milk and honey." From 1886 to 1925, over 80,000 children were sent from England to Canada.

Cohen wandered from Manitoba to British Columbia making a living as a ranch-hand, peddler, gambler and real estate speculator. Ultimately he drifted to Edmonton, Alta., where he became a ward boss in the Chinese quarter of the city. He lobbied successfully in 1913 in the provincial legislature for the repeal of the head tax clause in the Chinese Immigration Act.

He regularly played poker at a Chinese gambling hole in Saskatoon and one evening stumbled into the middle of an armed robbery. He did what came naturally to him, but what was unheard of at the time. He came to the defence of a Chinese man and knocked the burglar out. This selfless act enhanced his reputation with the Chinese community and brought him to the attention of Sun Yat-Sen, the Chinese nationalist leader, then in exile.

After a stint in the Canadian army during World War I, which included action in Belgium and France, he set out for China seeking both opportunity and adventure.

In 1922, he became an aide to Sun Yat-Sen, and later an advisor to his successor, Chaing Kai-Shek. He helped to organize the Kuomintang Army and was awarded the rank of general. From 1926 to 1927, he functioned in all but name as the Nationalist war minister. He took part in military campaigns against both Communist rebels and the Japanese, and carried out several secret missions to Europe to purchase arms and organize support for the Nationalist forces.

As a part-time gun runner and arms purchased, he was considered a valuable assset by the government. Always sporting two guns, he became a freelance public relations agent and a self-styled expert on China — without ever learning how to speak the language properly.

A prime virtue of this well researched and entertaining book is the author's vivid and knowledgeable depictions of the varied backgrounds that were part of Cohen's life. All in all this is a fascinating story about a most curious personality.

More Chanukah sites

Today, the second half of my Top Eight List of reasons to travel the Jewish Highway this Chanukah.

Reason No. 5 – The Crafts and Games

OK, the kids have made their dreidels, dreidels, dreidels out of clay. And now they're bored. No problem. There are plenty of Chanukah craft suggestions and games they can play on the Jewish Highway.

Start off at Virtual Jerusalem's Chanukah Megasite [http://www.virtual.co.il/city_services/holidays/chanukah/]. Play Jumping Jigsaws and put together an on-screen holiday puzzle.

Chanukah Match is a Concentration-type game in which you have to match pairs of pictures of menorahs and related holiday symbols. There's even a countdown clock and clapping sound effects. And in Mad Libs Anonymous, the computer asks you for a list of words and then uses them to assemble a nonsensical but hilarious rendition of the Chanukah story.

(To play some of these games, you will need to install Macromedia's Shockwave into your browser. Click on the link to download.)

As for crafts, try your hand at window sparklers and home-made gift wrap [http://jewishfamily.com/Holidays/lightup.htm]. There's a Chanukah coloring book you can print out at [http://www.shemayisrael.co.il/chanukah/more/coloring.htm] and more Chanukah activities at [http://www.shemayisrael.co.il/chanukah/more/activity.htm].

And what Jewish home can't use another menorah, especially if it's home-made? [http://jewishfamily.com/Holidays/makemenorah.htm].

Reason No. 6 – The Menorah

Speaking of menorahs, if you've forgotten how many candles to light, take a peek at the On-Line Menorah [http://www.torah.org/chanukah.html].

If you've forgotten the instructions for candlelighting, you'll find a very clear guide at [http://www.jcn18.com/holiday/hanukkah/how-to.htm].

Chanukiyot have been made from almost every substance imaginable. But just when you think you've seen it all, you stumble on the Lego Menorah [http://world.std.com/~ohl/hanuka.html].

Reason No. 7 – The Music

All your favorites are out there. So if you've forgotten the lyrics to Sevivon, Sov Sov, Sov!, you'll find it and others at [http://www.shamash.org/reform/uahc/congs/cd/cd001/chansong.html]. If you'd like to sing along with your computer, go to [http://www.virtual.co.il/city_services/holidays/chanukah/chantunes.htm] and for much more try [http://www.613.org/chanuka.html] and [http://www.ou.org/audio/channuka.html].

Reason No. 8 – The History

You can get a painless history lesson of the Maccabees and their victory at Morphing Greeks [http://www.virtual.co.il/city_services/holidays/chanukah/morphin.htm].

But for a more comprehensive history, see Rabbi Irving Greenberg's History of Hanukkah [gopher://shamash.org:70/00/places/boston/bakol/hanukkah/clalhanu].

One of the central themes of Chanukah is that it is not simply an ancient holiday, but that it has resonance today "bayamim hahem, bazman hazeh." In 1942, Moshe Flinker was a 16 year-old trying to observe Chanukah in Nazi-occupied Belgium [gopher://www.shamash.org:70/00/places/boston/bakol/hanukkah/yngmoshe].

It is particulary moving to read the teenager's diary when he quotes the lyrics of Maoz Tzur in light of the anguish he was facing: "Banish the foe, destroy the shadow of his image/ Provide us with a guiding light." Moshe Flinker died two years later in Auschwitz.

My favorite contemporary Chanukah story is Light in Montana: How One Town Said No to Hate [http://www.utne.com/lens/bms/11bmsmontana.html]. In 1993 in Billings, Mont., a brick was thrown through 5-year-old Isaac Schnitzer's window. The provocation: Isaac's window had been stencilled with a menorah.

After the investigating officer advised Isaac's mother to remove the religious symbol, the local newspaper published a drawing of a menorah.

By the end of the week, Billings, a town with several dozen Jewish families, had at least 6,000 homes decorated with menorahs. One sign read: "Not in Our Town! No Hate. No violence. Peace on Earth."

Have a very happy Chanukah!

Resnick was leader at CJC, TJC

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Samuel Resnick, a communal leader who headed many projects at the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) and Toronto Jewish Congress (TJC), died Nov. 22 at his home in Netanya. He was 75.

After making aliyah in 1988, Resnick devoted his time to volunteer activities and served as editor of the Netanya region magazine of the Association of Americans and Canadians in Israel (AACI).

Born in Quebec City, Resnick grew up in Brantford, Ont. He joined the Canadian Armed Forces during World War II and served with the Argylle and Sutherland Highlanders in Holland and Belgium.

On his return to Canada after the war, he entered McMaster University and received a law degree. At law school, he met and married Ruth Cornfield and they settled in Toronto.

In the early 1970s, he accepted a professional position with the TJC and CJC as a program coordinator overseeing numerous committees.

Genya Intrator, the chair of the

Sam Resnick

Canadian committee for Soviet Jewry of the CJC, worked with Resnick for many years, seeking the rescue of Soviet Jews from the Soviet Union.

"For this work, one needed a great deal of compassion as well as an understanding of the Soviet system and its merciless anti-Semitic regime, Intrator said.

"One had to always be one step ahead of the KGB. Sam Resnick possessed those qualities. He was very compassionate, he felt the pain and suffering of the Refuseniks and Prisoners of Zion, and he possessed a depth of intelligence that stood us in good stead."

"Sam Resnick was devoted to his family and his community and his loss is widely mourned by his friends and colleagues here and in Israel," said communal leader Sydney Harris.

In 1995, AACI honored Resnick as Volunteer of the Year for his dedication to the organization.

"Is there enough thanks to offer someone whose professionalism and humanity have gone a long way to make all of us the better for having worked with Sam and for knowing him," noted the AACI in their tribute.

The Resnicks were members of Toronto's Beth Tzedec Congregation and Beth Israel in Netanya.

Funeral services and shivah were held in Israel. Resnick leaves his wife Ruth; his children, Andy and Nira Resnick of Gedera, Israel; Julea and Robert Gasner of Toronto; Eddy and Suzanne Resnick of Ginot Shomron, Israel; nine grandchildren; and sister Rose Halpert of Toronto.

A community shloshim memorial service will take place on Dec. 24 at 8 p.m. at the Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue, 470 Glencairn Avenue.

JF &CS honorary president Goodman was a pioneer child welfare advocate

TORONTO — Henry Goodman, for 60 years a tireless volunteer and pioneer child welfare advocate in the Jewish community, died Dec. 14, following a brief illness. He was 90.

Goodman was most closely associated with Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS), of which he was honorary president. Despite his advancing years, he made a point of attending every JF&CS annual meeting, and taking a small bow to acknowledge the applause after being introduced.

Social policy and the welfare of children in need were his main interests. He served as president of the United Jewish Welfare Fund – predecessor to the current UJA Federation – and was a founding member of the fund's social planning committee, which he chaired for eight years.

He was also active in the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living, the Jewish Community Centre, Holy Blossom Temple and Toronto Jewish Congress.

Outside the Jewish community, he served on the board of the Metropolitan Toronto Children's Aid Society and on the executive of the social planning council of Metro Toronto.

Goodman was born in New York City to parents who had escaped pogroms in Russia. Three years later, the family moved to Toronto, where Henry stayed for the rest of his life.

He graduated from Osgoode

Henry Goodman

Hall law school in 1931 and set up a law practice, until the pull of business lured him away. With a group of friends, he began investing in industrial real estate, and went on to establish a property management company, which he ran well into his later years.

He married his beloved Jenne in 1932. This past June, the couple celebrated their 65th wedding anniversary.

Goodman began his volunteer service in 1937 as legal aid representative to the Jewish Big Brothers, a group that was later folded into JF&CS.

Ineligible for service, Goodman volunteered during World War II to train air cadets.

He rose to the presidency of JF&CS in the late 1960s and served two terms. He also served as the agency's honorary legal counsel and was the only person to hold the position of honorary past president.

In 1972, he and five other presidents of family agencies founded the Association of Jewish Family and Children's Agencies, which brings together Jewish family agencies through the United States and Canada.

In 1984, when JF&CS wanted to honor him, Goodman declined and instead urged the agency to set up its "Friends of JF&CS" campaign. Over the years, he raised hundreds of thousands of dollars through the Friends drive for several projects. One of them was the purchase of a foster home for developmentally handicapped children. In 1985, the home was named the Henry G. Goodman Group Foster Home.

"Children are our future," Goodman once remarked. "JF&CS was my first love because they take care of people from birth to death, and that's what being Jewish is about."

To mark Goodman's 90th birthday last January, JF&CS established the Henry and Jenne Goodman Scholarship Fund to enable Crown wards to pursue post-secondary education.

"He knew the meaning of mitzvah," said Gordon Wolfe, executive director of JF&CS. "He was a doer. He made sure things happened. He was a nudge, but in the best sense of the word."

Goodman leaves his wife Jenne; daughters Lesley Miller and Rhoda Lipton di Zitti; four grandchildren and four great-grandchildren.

Prien orphans to hold reunion

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — After half a dozen reunions spanning 30 years, Mickey Zworth and Moniek Lewkowitz have had enough. At their age, pulling the strings together to arrange a reunion for upwards of 100 people is getting a little too demanding.

So, on the weekend of July 4, the orphans of the Prien displaced persons camp will gather for what could be the last time, to celebrate a 50th anniversary reunion.

Zworth and Lewkowitz expect from 60 to 100 survivors and their spouses to travel to Toronto from locations across Canada and the United States for one last big get-together. The last reunion, held five years ago on board the SS Norway during a Caribbean cruise, attracted 130 people, including orphans and their spouses.

The get-togethers are emotional times for the Holocaust survivors, who lost their parents to the Nazi killing machine. Brought together after the war in Prien, near Munich in southern Germany, the orphans found new families in the other young people who experienced similar tragic circumstances.

"We have a lot in common," said Lewkowitz, whose parents were killed in Treblinka. "We grew up together. We were all orphans. If you didn't have family, you needed friends. We were closer than family."

For Lewkowitz, those ties still bind. He, along with Prien orphans Al Mucher and Sam and Jack Ganz have been getting together every Wednesday for the past 45 years to eat dinner and reminisce about old times.

Talking about old times is a big part of the reunions, Zworth and Lewkowitz said. At one get-together at the Concord Hotel in the Catskills, two widows who were sharing a room startled the other Prien orphans by their shouting. It turned out the two had shared a room back in Prien, but they didn't recognize each other until they began to talk over old times.

Zworth says he urges all participants to wear name tags and carry old photos from their days in Prien. "We all walk around with these buttons on and they say, 'Oh my God, you're Mickey.'"

For the estimated 3,000 youngsters who stayed at Prien from 1946 to '49, the camp marked a turning point in their lives, away from the horrors of the Holocaust towards new, more normal lives. The camp was run by UNRA, a United Nations agency, and it brought together orphans from across Europe for eventual resettlement.

Zworth, a native of Oradia-Mare in Romania, went from Prien to Winnipeg under the auspices of Canadian Jewish Congress, which helped with the orphans' resettlement in communities across Canada. Zworth was placed with the Mazo family on Selkirk Avenue, the heart of the city's post-war Jewish community.

From there, he moved to the remote mining town of Atikokan in northwestern Ontario, where he was able to apply a mechanics license he earned at the ORT school in Prien. After a short time, he moved to Port Arthur-Fort William, now Thunder Bay, where he got a job working in the furniture store owned by the Laskin family. Zworth remembers helping the family deliver Passover food to the small Jewish community. One of the two Laskin boys, Bora, went on to become chief justice of the Supreme Court.

From the lakehead, Zworth moved to Toronto where he continued in the furniture business. He became partners in a Los Angeles store with the spouse of another Prien orphan.

Lewkowitz, a native of Rajcyouw, Poland, survived the war in a labor camp. After liberation by Russian forces, he made his way to Munich with his cousin and eventually was brought to Prien by UNRA. He spent about seven months in the camp before moving to Canada in June 1948. He met his eventual wife, Faye, in Prien, and they were reunited in Toronto after she was relocated to South America in the late '40s.

Zworth and Lewkowitz organized the first Prien reunion in the mid-1960s and have held them on and off since then.

For more information, Zworth can be reached at 905-731-0175. Lewkowitz can be reached at 905-738-0028.

Book to name Jewish war dead

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Oscar Adler, a veteran of World War II, has a gnawing fear that the memory of the 422 Canadian Jews who died in the wars of this century will not be honored "because time is against us."

For this reason, he has helped form a group which hopes to publish the Canadian Jewish Book of Remembrance, which will list the names of all the 422 Canadians. The book will include hand-painted illustrations for the copies slated for the war archives, Ottawa; the Canadian Jewish Congress war archives, Montreal; and the archives of Canadian Jewish War Veterans.

In addition copies, without the hand-painting, would go to all synagogues and Jewish libraries in Canada.

The book would also include the names of about 17,000 Canadian Jews who served in the Armed Forces in World War I and II, and in Korea.

The project is being undertaken apart from the Royal Canadian Legion and its Jewish branches, explained Adler who is president, Canadian Jewish War Memorial Association. Other officers are Sam Ross, secretary/vice-president, and Meyer Shear, treasurer/vice-president. It has 95 members.

A little known fact, said Adler, is that 26 Jews from the United States served in the Canadian Armed Forces. Another fact is that 2,000 Canadian Jews enlisted before 1941, when news of the Holocaust started to leak out.

The inspiration for the Jewish Book of Remembrance came to Adler in 1991 when he met a woman who lost two brothers in World War II. They were Zavey Brown, killed in action with the Royal Hamilton Light Infantry after 52 days overseas, and Sydney Brown, shot down over Europe in an RCAF bomber aircraft.

"Who will remember my brothers after my death," Adler recalls the woman saying.

He estimates about $70,000 will be needed to do the research and publish the Book of Remembrance and to this end the association has obtained a registration number so that donations will qualify for income tax exemption.

The address of the association is 640 Sheppard Ave., E., #602, North York, Ont., M2K 1B8, 416-225-1276

Teachers urged to create positive learning experience

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It is up to a teacher to do whatever is possible to give students a positive academic experience and prepare them for a healthy emotional future.

If a teacher can't create a classroom environment that can accomplish those goals, nothing they do will be effective, asserts education consultant Pamela Sims.

Having taught primary school and special education for some 20 years, Sims knows whereof she speaks. Besides, she told The CJN candidly, "I want schools to be better than when I was a kid. I hated school."

Sims has put her philosophy into an aptly named book, Awakening Brilliance; How to inspire children to become successful learners, (Bayhampton Publications, 1997).

She is firm in her belief that "if teachers don't create supportive, emotionally caring relationships with their students, it doesn't matter what they teach them. They won't be able to reach them.

"Curriculum becomes obsolete as we create it, but how students feel about themselves stays with them forever."

Many children, she said, don't do well, simply "because we don't expect them to do well."

Sims decried teachers who use humiliation, insults or sarcasm in the classroom.

If teachers create the proper environment, it is easy to teach, she believes.

"We must show each person that they are important. We must give them permission to make mistakes. That way, students will see that it is OK to try new things."

This attitude does not only apply to the good student, she said – it is also valid for the slow or learning disabled learner.

The teacher should connect personally with each child, Sims said. She recommends greeting a child at the door, and commenting on something about him – a new pair of shoes, or a funky shirt, for instance.

"It may sound cheesy, but it works. It makes the child glad to be there, and that makes them willing to give you the opportunity to teach."

It is important to remember that children learn in different ways, Sims said, adding that a school program needs to take into account all those learning styles, so children can develop all their skills.

Some students, for instance, need to move around a lot to learn. But because classrooms are not set up for that, they get into trouble, and are made to feel like failures, she said. She suggested that rather than straight lecture-style teaching, students might benefit from being able to get up and walk around from time to time, or do projects rather than written assignments.

'Kids are our future'

Teachers must also be aware of problems children might be having in their home life. If their parents are going through a divorce, for instance, children will not be emotionally ready to learn.

She acknowledged that it is often difficult for teachers to have the energy to do their jobs as well as they might want to, what with the "bad press" they often get, and the constant financial cutbacks.

Everyone, parents, schools and governments, have to remember, she said, that "kids are our future.

Pamela Sims

We are not selling computers [in our schools]. Our product is children.

She had harsh words for the tendency to label children. If a child is identified as learning disabled in Grade 1, for instance, they have to live with that label for some two years, until the remediation process can get to them.

"We know what the child needs – he needs help right away," she said, urging remediation in the classroom.

Gifted children shouldn't be left to flounder either, she said. It is wrong to assume that a gifted child will be able to cope with anything. They need programs geared to their special talents just as much as the weaker students, so they too can reach their full potential.

Awakening Brilliance is written from the point of view of a new school principal, determined to improve the atmosphere and the learning environment in her school by working on improving her staff's communication and teaching skills. Many examples in the book are taken from Sim's own experiences.

An extensive appendix includes ways to boost a child's self-esteem, how to organize a classroom to maximize learning, setting goals and ways to address different learning styles.

Cohen helps to create Jewish centre in Dharmsala

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — There are many individuals and organizations reaching out to unaffiliated and disaffected Jews in North America. Azriel Cohen, however, has turned his attention elsewhere – to India.

Cohen, a Torontonian working as a freelance computer artist, is embarking on a fundraising trip throughout North America with a small group of friends, to establish a centre in Dharmsala, the headquarters of the Dalai Lama, for Jewish tourists to meet, socialize and rediscover the beauty of their own heritage.

"Many of these Jews [the ones in India] felt a great anger towards their roots," Cohen said. "They needed healing.

"Just as they had an opportunity in an open way to learn about eastern religions, they should have the same kind of chance to learn about Judaism. Many of them felt that the Jewish environment was shutting them down, while the eastern religions opened them up," Cohen explained.

The whole adventure started when Cohen, who had been studying alternative dispute resolution, decided to travel to get more experience in the technique. "I was interested in how we communicate with each other and in how conflict occurs," he said.

While working and studying in New York, he had arranged meetings between Jewish artists. "It was a way to bring religious and secular Jews together."

He was advised by an Israeli working in the same field, to try to make contact with secular Israelis, to see how they view the world. Since many of them had been to India, Cohen said, he decided to go there too.

After helping with a Chabad seder in Nepal, he went, videocamera and microcassette in hand, on a fact-finding tour. "I spoke to every Jew I could find," he reported enthusiastically.

Eventually he teamed up with four Americans who had opened a restaurant-cum-meeting house for Jewish tourists, who, Cohen said, comprised eight out of 10 non-Indians in the town.

Cohen helped run Friday night dinners and Shabbat programs. On his next visit last fall, he helped build a sukkah on the roof of the restaurant.

Together with Michi Yosefi ("Who would expect to find a guy with a beard and payes in India?"), he arranged a three-week program for the Jewish High Holy Days.

"I came back to to India with only the clothes I was wearing, a knapsack filled with shofars and books and cassettes to start a library."

The program included services, meals and classes. "Michi ran the services and I ran the classes. I tried to make them meaningful and appropriate to the people there; so I taught about things like reincarnation, the concept of prophesy and enlightenment, and meditation."

Close to 200 people came for Rosh Hashanah, Cohen said, and over 70 for Sukkot.

Sukkot was an impressive experience for the 32-year-old Thornhiller. "We left one side of the sukkah open, so you could see the valley. We had meals on the floor on mats, with candles all around."

None of the rituals were carried out without explaining the meaning, Cohen said. "People were crying over what they were experiencing. For the first time, they saw that they were getting something that could enrich their lives."

Yosefi, together with his wife and child, has gone to Goa, in southern India, to set up a similar program to that in Dharmsala.

Plans are underway to celebrate Pesach in Dharmsala next year, and Cohen and Yosefi are trying to find a teacher for a program that will run after a major speech the Dalai Lama is giving next March.

Cohen and some of the Dharmsala organizers are taking a slide show across the United States to show people what they are doing, and to try to raise funds to continue. Cohen will show his slides at Beth Avraham Yoseph in Thornhill on Jan. 26.

For more information about the organization call The Tree of Life at 1-800-MEANING (1-800-632-6464).

UTT leader urges parents to monitor kids' TV time

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Too many parents ignore the influence that television has on their children says the vice-president of the Union for Traditional Judaism (UTJ).

"Surveys have shown that children spend about two minutes each day in meaningful conversation with their parents, and about four hours daily in front of the television or computer. In terms of volume, that is significant," says Rabbi Ronald Price, also dean of the Institute of Traditional Judaism.

Rabbi Price, who spent a recent weekend as scholar-in-residence at Beth Sholom Synagogue, said that a major challenge facing parents is equipping young people to decipher what they are watching on television.

"We want to be able to throw a switch and open kids' minds as they watch. They are absorbing values we may or may not like," he said.

UTJ spent two years, he said, in trying to come up with a response to this challenge. "Some parents just turn off the television. Others have a computer chip that is used to block out certain programs. Parents can use this chip, but kids will watch want they want elsewhere. The hard road is to confront the material and teach kids how to respond appropriately."

Censorship, said Rabbi Price, does not work. "Instead, we must give our children the tools they need to see TV critically, with Jewish eyes."

The MTV Challenge (Media and Torah values) was developed, he said, "as a result of this challenge. We had a group including a psychiatrist, a rabbi and a Jewish educator view 150 hours of the worst and best that television had to offer on basic cable. The images were often troubling and vulgar, as well as humorous and entertaining."

From these tapes, he said, "we divided 13 trigger tapes, which range in length from 30 seconds to eight minutes. When we ran these tapes for students, we talked about the values portrayed in the clip and studied classical Jewish texts that discussed these values."

The seeds for MTV were planted, said Rabbi Price, after his daughter asked him to study with her and he waited to help her until his favorite television show ended.

"This was the first time I thought that maybe I was addicted to this material."

MTV, which was completed three months ago, is now in 150 schools in the United States. "It is the first of its kind in any religion. There is nothing like it – nothing that brings media in its raw state and talks about values."

Rabbi Price said that after viewing a Beavis & Butthead clip that involved the pair cutting down a tree, and fighting with each other, students discussed how important it is to have proper respect for our world. "They also talked about solving differences without punching someone in the nose."

After seeing a music tape that had someone using and controlling another person, students studied a passage from Pirkei Avot that says "all love which depends on a thing will pass away as soon as that thing disappears. If love doesn't depend on a thing, it will never disappear."

The response to MTV, said Rabbi Price "has been heartwarming. These kids have made Torah part of their lives."

Winnipeg kosher suppliers closing

By MYRON LOVE
Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Jewish Winnipeggers are flocking to Weidman Foods Inc., Western Canada's largest kosher products wholesaler, to cash in on one of the largest liquidation sales of this kind of product that the city has ever seen.

Several hundred thousand dollars worth of dry goods are being sold off in case lots for as much as 60 percent off.

Weidman Foods was one of the oldest wholesale food suppliers in the city. Although company president Donald Weidman is refusing comment, the Winnipeg Free Press reported in an article on Dec. 9 that the company was forced to close after the Manischewitz Co., one of its largest suppliers, terminated its agreement with Weidman on short notice.

Also closing is Acme Produce Co. (1969) Ltd., the last kosher poultry-killing plant in Winnipeg (and in Western Canada). The poultry killing plant is closing its doors at the end of the year due to a lack of business.

Operated business since 1969

"We feel bad about closing," says Morris Brown, who co-owns the company with his brother, Harvey, "but there is not enough business throughout the year to keep going. We are not getting the support from the community. We can't even find a buyer for the company."

The Brown Family has operated the business since 1969. Business started to drop off in earnest about five or six years ago, Morris Brown says.

Except for Pesach, Chanukah and High Holy Day times, there is no longer much demand for fresh kosher chicken here, he reports.

Local kosher retailers regret the closings but downplay the impact on their own businesses or the availability of kosher products here.

"We are feeling a short-term effect from Weidman's closing out sale," says Bathurst Street Market's Jack Kravetsky. "People are buying case lots there. But business is slow this time of year anyway."

Kravetsky reports that Bathurst has been able to find new suppliers for virtually all the kosher lines that Weidman carried.

"It is taking us a little longer with Marvid Chickens," he says. "We have never dealt with them directly before so it is a matter of establishing a relationship."

For Bathurst, the closing of Weidman Foods is an issue of convenience more than anything else. Products will have to be ordered a week in advance as compared to having it delivered the next day.

"We are just going to have to be on the ball about placing orders a little earlier," says Alan Rappaport, the owner of Omnitsky Kosher Foods. "Acme was closed for three months last winter and there was no effect. We brought in fresh chickens from Toronto and we will do the same thing now."

Tuxedo Quality Foods has arranged to bring in its kosher chickens from Montreal. "It is unfortunate that Weidman and Acme are closing," says store manager Ian McDonald. But "we have already made arrangements with other suppliers."

The Canadian Jewish news

For whom we sing

One of the chief ways human beings celebrate is through song. Rabbi Nahman of Bratzlav once told his disciples that "all melodies come from the source of sanctity." Song and melody convey certain inner truths because, as Rabbi Nahman suggested, they are expressions of the things that are inexplicable that lie within the human heart.

Chanukah is renowned for its many celebratory melodies. We sing songs of thanksgiving, of heroism, of miracles, of candle-lighting and of culinary delights. The melodies are upbeat; our emotions leap in festive air; no sadness intrudes.

And for whom do we sing? We sing for our children. We want to instil into their hearts the transformative "magic" of our holiday, and in the process, of our traditions and values.

The photo that appears on the cover of this supplement attests so poignantly to our purpose.

Two sweet and adorable young Israeli children, each with a Chanukah candle lighting a path to their own possibilities, are clapping their tiny hands in rhythmic response to a melody we cannot hear. But, following Rabbi Nahman's advice, we know its source.

One of Chanukah's most familiar songs is Maoz Tsur. It's third verse however, is little sung, and thus little known. We reproduce it and imagine in our mind's ear that the two youngsters pictured above are keeping time to its age-old beat.

The translation is our adaptation of that of Gustav Gottheil and M. Jastrow.

O children of our people,
Whether free or fettered,
Wake the echoes of your songs,
Wherever you may be scattered.
Yours should be the message,
cheering,
The time is surely nearing
When we will see
All people free
And tyrants disappearing.

Reminding us of who we are

Editorial

It is no coincidence that in Hebrew, there is one word, shir, for poem and for song. The word is interchangeably used for both because a song is, after all, a poem of the heart.

This year, The CJN received more than 400 poems of the heart in response to our annual Chanukah poetry contest, each singing a personal, sometimes playful, sometimes sharply insightful, song about Chanukah. The number of poems has increased steadily over the three years that we have invited our readers to submit Chanukah poetry. The figure is even more remarkable this year when one considers the intervention of the recently resolved postal strike.

As I have written in years past, it cannot be said in any meaningful way that in publishing some of the poems, we are choosing "winners" from among the many we received. If indeed a "winner" has emerged from so pleasant a poetic exercise it is The CJN. We have reaped the greatest reward, for we have had the rare opportunity of reading the hundreds of unique poems and of "singing" the songs that call out from the hearts of our readers.

We have decided to publish eight poems as preeminent poems, for lack of a better term. They are the "winners;" four are from poets under 12 years of age, two from poets aged 12 and 13, and two from poets who are older than 18. They appear on pages 10 and 11 of the supplement.

We have also published a number of other poems throughout the supplement as a further way of highlighting for our readers the flare and artistry that stoke the imagination of some of our readers.

The Chanukah-related poetry forms the centrepiece of our supplement. But we have also published a variety of articles about Israel and the Jewish world, including an in-depth look at Haifa written by our Israel correspondent Edgar Asher, a description of an attempt in Israel at cross-ethnic education, a view of Chanukah in Moscow, and a selection of tasty Chanukah recipes compiled by staff writer Leila Speisman.

We hope our readers will be entertained and stimulated by the offerings in this supplement. In leafing through its pages, however, we ask you to take special notice of the poems. We ask you to raise high your antennae, as it were, to receive and even to "sing" the songs and the melodies from the many hearts that have been opened on our pages.

Readers will find poems with familiar imagery, familiar color and familiar messages, each with a unique nuance, each a celebration in its own right, of the holiday of Chanukah. Ten-year old Shoshana Binder may have expressed the meaning of the poems and the meaning of Chanukah most poignantly when she wrote:

Eight little fires
for all of us to see reminding us of who we are and who we ought to be.

Couple works to change cultural attitudes

By LISA SAMIN
WZPS

She was born in Siberia, on the Mongolian border, to a family of high-ranking Jewish Polish officers. He was born in Hebron, to an agricultural family. Her family was executed and she fled to Israel via Europe in 1948. He was a Fatah activist on the streets of Hebron. She served in the Israeli army in the early years of the state. He was jailed by the Israeli authorities for inciting riots.

Today, Dr. Ruth Firer, who has a PhD in education from Hebrew University, and Dr. Sami Adwan, who has a PhD in education from San Francisco University and now teaches at Bethlehem University, are working together to "change cultural attitudes of 100 years of animosity and conflict," between the Israeli and Palestinian people.

Firer and Adwan met in East Jerusalem in 1993 at a meeting between faculty members of the Hebrew University's Harry S Truman Research Institute for the Advancement of Peace and the Palestinian Consultancy Group (PCG), which deals with Palestinian international cultural and educational issues.

"We are both educators who believe that the politicians cannot be counted on to bring real peace. This must come from the grassroots educational level. They can sign peace – they cannot build it," says Firer, a stately woman with a quick smile.

"Education has power in forming identity. We realize that if we truly want peace between our peoples, it must begin with learning about and understanding each other," adds Adwan, a quiet man with a courtly manner.

Their project, Peace Education – A joint Israeli-Palestinian Initiative, aims to give formal and informal educators, from elementary school through to university level and adult education, points of reference, resources and tools to infuse

Program analyzes Palestinian, Israeli texts

the message of peace into their lessons, to involve Israeli and Palestinian scholars and at a later stage, Arab scholars from Egypt and Jordan.

The program is intended primarily for implementation in Israel and in Arab and Muslim countries, but can also be used in countries with a high concentration of Jews, Arabs and Muslims, such as the United States and parts of Europe.

The first stage in the project is to analyze the current textbooks being used for Israelis and Palestinians and assess what needs to be revised in this new era of peace. The comparison deals with differences in the textbooks, with regard to structure, terminology, choice of facts emphasized and interpretations. Topics that cannot be compared because they are missing in one of the two sets of texts are mentioned as well.

"We are not attempting to minimize differences and conflicts," says Adwan. "Rather we are putting them in the context of the ongoing relationship between Arabs and Jews throughout history to the present, and helping to create a greater appreciation for both similarities and differences."

"Our first recommendations," says Firer, "were made with great caution because of the sensitive Israeli-Palestinian situation."

Areas of recommendation included: the legitimacy of differences in presenting historical stories, attitudes, and beliefs; the mutual need to uproot stereotypes, prejudice and hatred; the need to include in textbooks missing historical, cultural and religious information; the need to improve pedagogical methods in the spirit of international tolerance and education; and the need to use methods of conflict resolution recently developed in the free world.

Firer and Adwan have received international recognition from the European Union, support from the United Nations Peace Education Program and UNICEF. Recently, the United States Institute of Peace gave a modest grant for support of the project.

"What they're doing is essential to laying the ground for peace. It is very similar to what was done after World War II between France and Germany, Poland and Germany and more recently, between the United States and Japan: building an understanding for peace at the classroom level," said Dr. Reinhard Yoav Freiberg, former director of UNICEF in Europe and senior researcher at the Truman Institute.

However, not everyone agrees with Firer and Adwan's direction. Esther Wachsman, an American-born Israeli high school teacher and mother of soldier Nachshon Wachsman who was slain by Hamas terrorists, writes in a compelling article, Daily Life – the Real Classroom, in the Jerusalem Post of June 26: "I grew up in the most democratic country in the world, and yet we did not study democracy in school. We inhaled a culture of democracy, we were born into it, it was as unconscious and natural as breathing.

"Unless values are internalized and accepted unconditionally," she continued, "no amount of teaching and testing will work."

Firer and Adwan believe that these attitudes can become internalized through classroom learning and grassroots activism for democratic learning. Thus, for the second stage of their program they have devised a fill-in package for textbooks and history textbooks to distribute to Israeli and Palestinian teachers.

"We do not want to burden teachers and students with extra work," says Firer. "We want to give teachers selected pieces of information to incorporate into their lessons, like a drop of water, a bit at a time, until the glass is full."

Now at the pilot stage, the packages will be distributed to some Israeli state-run and Palestinian private schools.

At the same time, Firer and Adwan have started working with the Israeli and Palestinian scout (youth) groups to build fill-in packages for their informal educational activities. The scouts on both sides, who serve youth ages 12 to 15, are interested in teaching peace to a new generation of young people.

Adwan, who has six children ranging from four months to 14 years says, "Our two cultures are built on negating each other. We want to put education prospects into the politicians' agenda and ensure that our children will live a normal lifestyle without guns, jails, shooting and explosions. We need to build respect for each other's existence and independent identity. From there we can achieve lasting peace."

Chanukah

Conservative, Orthodox or Reform.
Having faith meant salvation, as did uniti.
And the menorah's flame became Judaism's Northern Star.
Nights despairing turned into days rejoicing in a new era.
U-turn, the year nineteen ninety-seven, so many egocentric.
Knew trouble would persist, but so much internal?
As we light each candle, remember our flame.
Hate destroys!

Chanukah in Moscow

By LEV KRICHEVSKY
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

Just before Chanukah last year, Faye Siegel wanted to set up a holiday party for other American Jews living in Moscow, but she didn't know many – so she called the U.S. Embassy.

"Tell me, please, do you have any Jews out there in the embassy who might be interested in celebrating Chanukah," she asked a marine guard at the embassy switchboard.

"I'm Jewish, madam, and I'm interested," he answered.

In the end, some 40 Jewish expatriates gathered in a private home to celebrate Chanukah.

That event marked the founding of Jewish in Moscow (JIM), a group that aims to provide a feeling of community – especially during holidays – for Jewish expatriates.

What started as a small number of enthusiasts has turned into a vibrant Jewish group with participants who come to celebrate holidays (140 people attended a Passover seder at the U.S. Embassy) and a steering committee to plan future activities.

"My entire life has been part of the Jewish community," said Siegel, who heads JIM.

For a number of years, she was in charge of the Women's Division at the Atlanta Jewish Federation.

Last year, she came to Moscow after her husband was transferred by the accounting firm Deloitte and Touche.

Today, JIM involves 160 people, most of them Americans working in a wide range of businesses, including fast food restaurants, travel agencies, banks and law firms.

Eugene Weiner, who has been behind much of the expatriate Jewish activity in Moscow and hosted last year's Chanukah party, estimates that some 300 to 400 American Jews are working in the Russian capital.

"Most of them are in their late 20s or early 30s," said Weiner, who immigrated to Israel from New York 25 years ago. "They tend to be single and very entrepreneurial."

Usually, Americans come to work here for two or three years, but many stay longer.

"They are very inclined to be interested in joining the Jewish community," said Weiner who came to Russia last year as head of special projects for the Moscow office of the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee.

"None of the expatriates is interested in settling here, but they are interested in maintaining their Jewish identity while they are here," Weiner said.

Just a few years ago, Avi Aliman had what was then a typical Jewish expatriate experience in Moscow.

Aliman, the general director of the Moscow-based company Travel House, recalled how he invited his friends to a Passover seder at what was then the city's only restaurant that advertised itself as Jewish.

"We came and what we first found on our table was vodka and bread," said Aliman, 25, a member of the JIM steering committee who came here from Los Angeles five years ago.

Now that holiday events have already become a tradition, the group wants to expand its activities by having regular Shabbat dinners at members' homes, starting a newsletter, organizing classes to study classical Jewish texts and even establishing a Jewish school for their children.

But Aliman, like other JIM leaders, believes that the group's activities should not be restricted to expatriates.

"We are interested in connecting up with Moscow Jews, in participating in the community here," said Aliman.

Siegel said her dream is to establish a place in Moscow that "we can call our community centre, where the expatriates and Russian Jews can come to study, to learn, to celebrate together."

Moscow's Chief Rabbi Pinchas Goldschmidt said expatriate Jews in Moscow can contribute significantly to the city's native community.

"They think they don't know much, but they know much more than most Jews here," said Rabbi Goldschmidt, who is probably the longest-term Jewish expatriate in Moscow.

Born in Switzerland, Rabbi Goldschmidt lived and studied in Israel and the United States before coming here in 1989 and taking his rabbinical post the following year.

"I would like to see more Jewish expatriates coming out of the closet," he said.

Chanukah

Alexander the Great conquered many lands
He made many nations bow down on their hands
But Alexander had a soft spot for the Jews,
And let them keep their religion,
While the Greeks drank their booze.
When Alexander died King Antiochus came to power
He made it tougher for the Jews each passing hour.
He took the temple away,
And went out to say:
No Jews should bow down to their God, their God is invisible. From now I shall be your God and you shall bow down to my idols.
The Jew Matityahu and his five sons,
Went out to war against the Greek bums.
The Maccabees fought until they defeated the Greeks,
They saved their temple after battling for weeks.
They cleaned the temple all around,
This way, that way, up and down
The menorah was set
But oil they still needed to get
They found oil but just a touch,
And thought it would not last too much
The oil lasted for eight long days
For which they were happy in lots of ways.
We celebrate Chanukah for many reasons,
Least of all that Jews will be here as long as there are seasons.
So may we all celebrate the miracle of lights,
For eight peaceful and happy nights.

Haifa: a city in change

By EDGAR ASHER
Israel Correspondent

Part 1

Haifa, Israel's third largest city, is undergoing a significant transformation as it enters the third millennium.

The transformation is not only physical; it is also a transformation of ideas and attitudes, spearheaded by the city's energetic mayor, Amram Mitzna, a true son of Haifa.

Mitzna grew up and went to school in the city and graduated from Haifa University. In 1963, at age 18, Mitzna joined the IDF and spent most of his military service in the armored corps. In 1986, he was made a major-general and subsequently served as assistant chief of staff for operations, head of central region command and head of the IDF planning division. He retired from the army in March 1993 after 30 years of distinguished service, and was elected mayor of Haifa in November 1993.

Mitzna is not universally praised by all of Haifa's citizens and business community, but by and large, he is a popular and respected man who has the unenviable task of steering this large and diverse city towards new horizons, with the aim of fully developing the tourist potential of the city while emphasizing its place at the hub of the country's leading industrial and high-tech companies.

The city, which has a population of 247,000, is built on three topographical levels. The lower city, established on land partly recovered from the sea, is the commercial centre and harbor. The middle level is an older residential area. The top level is comprised of rapidly expanding modern neighborhoods, parks and pine woods. It is from the top level that one can see magnificent views of the city and the port below, day and night.

The origins of Haifa are obscure, although the name does appear in third century CE talmudic literature. The derivation of the name "Haifa" is itself subject to controversy. One scholar has suggested that the name was a contraction of the Hebrew words Hof Yafa – beautiful coast.

In the Middle Ages, under Arab domination, Haifa was a town of some importance, but it was destroyed in 1100 CE by the Crusaders, under the command of Tancred, prince of Galilee. From that time, the importance of the city waned and its northern neighbor Akko became the most important town in the region. By the time of the conquest of the Ottoman Turks at the end of 1516, Haifa was an insignificant village decaying and in ruins.

From the Ottoman conquest until the establishment of the State of Israel, the fortunes of the city ebbed

Burning Light

We pulled the Curtains down
So no one Could see

We got out
The candles
And were thankful
To be free.

The Chanukiah
Was lit
Each candle
Grew bright

We held hands Together
The light removed
Our fright.

And then it happened
It seemed
So long Ago

A knocking
And kicking down the door
The candles
We couldn't blow...

The Germans
Were there
To take us Away

It was Chanukah
We begged
We wanted to stay.

I look back
Now
To that Chanukah Night

When we were
All taken Except for our Burning Light.

Haifa was a key port

and flowed like the sea around it. By 1944, the city had a population of 128,000, 52 percent of whom were Jews.

Following the establishment of the State of Israel in 1948, the Jewish population grew rapidly. Haifa was the country's most important port and new immigrants who reached Israel through Haifa were happy to settle in the city, as they had a quarter of a century earlier.

From 1951 until his death in 1969, the mayor of the city was Abba Khoushi. During his incumbency, Haifa underwent sweeping changes in its commercial and residential development. Although the city was changed beyond recognition, the alterations also created a developer's nightmare if the city was to modernize and become attractive in its own right as the capital of the north.

"The problem with Haifa today is that the city, a port city, is physically separated from the sea. We aim to change that," says Mitzna, speaking at City Hall in a room full of maps, diagrams and computer-enhanced photographs that describe what the city will look like in the next century.

Hotels

"Already some of the sites are realities or in an advanced development stage," he says. "We intend to connect the city to the port. Due to its development over the years, the port and its industrial zone to the east remain isolated. Our plans are to move the existing container port eastward and open up the central area of the port to the general public.

"There will be hotel facilities and a marina. All this will be connected to a new garden complex that will begin high up at the Baha'i Gardens and sweep down through the German Colony towards the sea 1.25 kilometres away.

"We are going to continue to invest in our transportation infrastructure," the mayor explains, pointing to a development map of the whole bay area. "The residential parts of the bay area are to be connected to existing rail links and terminals to provide a quick and efficient transport service. Already we have new rolling stock from Denmark, which is being used on existing portions. The central bus station in Bat Galim is to be demolished and moved south to the entrance of the city, which is also an area for extensive commercial development.

"We haven't forgotten the road infrastructure. We intend to improve existing roads and build new ring

The Flame of Hope

We are shadows,
Without any spark of life.
We are ghosts,
Void of any hope, of any feeling.
We are dust,
Waiting to be swept up into nothing.
We are hostages of evil.
And yet, in all of this darkness
A single flame leaps up.
Representing courage,
Reminding us that there is hope.
Dark forms gather around the candle,
The flame is passed around
And kindles the light that is in all of us
The light of life.

Plans set to make Haifa more accessible roads to relieve congestion in the city centre."

Mitzna then points on the map to the city's airport along the coast at Haifa Bay. "We also plan to extend the existing runway of Haifa's airport by another 1,200 metres. This is very practical and environmentally good, because the position of the existing runway allows aircraft to land and take off in the direction of the sea, thus causing little or no local noise pollution."

The extension will allow bigger and quieter passenger jets to come directly to Haifa from European destinations.

The proposed infrastructure changes are all intended to be part of the master plan to make the city more accessible to both tourists and businesspeople. Today few tourists come to Haifa, and those that do only stay in the city for a day or two, even though the city is ideally suited as a base to tour northern Israel.

Another attraction is the excellence of the city's community relations. In Haifa, Arabs and Jews really do live and work together. This is not a new phenomenon, as the growth of the city itself and the historical influences of its varied rulers have brought people together. Today, Jews represent 89.6 percent of the city's population; Christians 6.7 percent, Muslims 3.5 percent, Druze and others 0.2 percent. Within the ethnic groups can be found unique, small, yet influential communities, such as the Ahmadis and Baha'is.

The special relationship between religious and ethnic communities can best be seen at the Beit Hagefen Arab-Jewish Centre, which was established in 1963 to promote coexistence and understanding between Arab and Jew. Such is its success that similar centres following the style and programs of Beit Hagefen have been established in other mixed communities, such as Jaffa and Acre.

"One of the most important things that enables Beit Hagefen to continue its work is the support we get from the Municipality of Haifa and the Ministry of Education, who between them contribute 90 percent of our budget," says Hani Elfar the deputy director of the centre.

"The centre is an independent non-political organization. By means of cultural and educational activities it fosters better relations between all religions and communities. We have programs for both adults and school children. We hold about 20 art exhibitions every year in which both Jewish and Arab artists show their works together. We have a public library that contains over 50,000 books in Hebrew, Arabic and English. We hold courses in sports, languages and hobbies. A very important part of our work is the organization of cross cultural visits to Arab and Jewish schools."

Elfar, a Christian Arab, mentions that the immediate past chairman of the advisory board of Beit Hagefen was a religious Jew, who is now the head of Haifa's Religious Council.

"Yitzhak Getz held the position of chairman of our advisory board for six years until he stood down a year ago. He worked untiringly to promote our work and ideals, and it was his efforts that persuaded many religious Jews to support and help us. I am happy to say that Yitzhak Getz is still a very active board member."

Haifa is also the home of the Carmelites. When the Carmelites first came to the country in the mid-17th century, they settled near Elijah's cave, not far from the sea at the southern approach of the city. They soon encountered opposition from the Muslims, who also regarded the cave as being religiously significant, and were subsequently forced to move up the mountain to establish a new monastery known today as Stella Maris.

Home to two young religions

Stella Maris has had a violent history. The original monastery was blown up by Abdulla, ruler of Akko, in 1821. The present building dates from 1836 and was designed as a fortress, as the monks intended to defend themselves if they were attacked again. Inside the building is a beautiful church built around another cave that the Carmelites associate with the prophet Elijah, who is also their patron.

Opposite the monastery, on a promontory which commands a spectacular view of Haifa Bay, is a house known as The Lighthouse. Built by Abdulla after he destroyed the monastery in 1821, the house became known as Abdulla's Palace. Later the Carmelites enlarged the building and built a hostel on the site. The Spanish consul at the time donated a lighthouse that was erected on the roof of the hostel. He also gave the name Stella Maris to the site and the adjoining area.

During World War II, the building was requisitioned by the British, who used it to monitor all vessels trying to enter the port, as well as illegal immigrant ships carrying Jews escaping from Nazi controlled Europe. Today it is still a military base.

A cable car connects Stella Maris with Bat Galim on the seashore.

Elijah's Cave, near the site where the Carmelites originally settled, is at a walking distance from Bat Galim. The cave, which has religious significance for Judaism, Christianity, Islam and Druze, is the most sacred Jewish site in Haifa. Pilgrims come all year round, believing that to pray in the cave will heal the sick and assist barren women to bear children.

In keeping with its religious diversity, Haifa is the home of two of the world's youngest religions, the Ahmadis and the Baha'is.

The Ahmadis, a sect found only in Haifa, are Muslims who settled in the city at the turn of the century. They believe that they have the role of changing Islam by peaceful means only and they totally reject the concept of jihad (holy war).

The five million adherents of the Baha'i faith have their world centre in Haifa. The golden domed mausoleum that contains the remains of the Bab, one of the two founders of the religion, dominates the Haifa skyline. The Bab was executed by Armenian soldiers in Tabriz in 1850.

"The shrine was designed in 1950 by the Canadian architect William Sutherland Maxwell," says Ann Boyles, a Canadian Baha'i who is spending some years at the world centre.

"What we see here is the administrative centre of our faith. The reason the centre is established here is because Baha'u'llah, the prophet-founder of our faith, decreed just before his death near Acre in 1892, that Haifa should be the worldwide administrative centre. He also decreed that the Bab, his martyred forerunner, should be buried here. This was done in 1909. Baha'u'llah is buried in nearby Acre, which is the most holy place on earth for the Baha'i."

The Baha'i shrine and all the administrative buildings are connected together by a unique set of exquisite gardens which have no equal in Israel. At the moment, a three-kilometre long landscape project is under construction. It will consist of terraced gardens that will stretch from the top of the Carmel, through the existing Baha'i gardens, to the sea below. The project is being carefully coordinated with the municipality so that the final result is harmoniously integrated. The completion of this project in a few years will be another incentive for tourists to come to Haifa.

The newly completed Haifa Convention Centre has facilities for up to 3,000 people. [Edgar Asher photo]

Chanukah

Je regarde dehors par la fenêtre
Et je vois la lumière

Je sens la chaleur
Et je sens le bonheur

Je me souviens de l'histoire de Chanukah
Et je me rappelle de la beauté de la menorah

Je m'aperçois que nous sommes le vingt-cinq kislev
Et je constate que ce n'est pas un rêve

Je chante la prière de l'allumage
Et je murmure un voeu pour mon peuple au large

Je sens la friture à la cuisine
Et je mange les beignes qui me donnent bonne mine

Nous, tous ensemble les jeunes et les vieux
Célébrons le miracle de Dieu

The Little Dreidels

One dreidel short and sweet, another dreidel stuffed with meat.
Another dreidel named Shaun, another dreidel named Mom.
Mom and Shaun went to a party and met a friend named Smarty.
Smarty is a candy round and sweet,
he was very good to eat,
But then Smarty rolled out the door,
he rolled and rolled till I could not see him no more.

Chanukah

Chanukah is a holiday of light
It really is a beautiful sight
Seeing the dreidels spin
Happy as I am I get goosebumps on my skin
I also love those huge smiles
They go up to miles and miles
But the best part of all is that chanukiah
I put it outside the window of my sister Leah
The candle lasts all night long
But I stay up singing all sorts of Chanukah songs
Happy Chanukah to everyone
I hope you have a great one!

by Sophie Saragosti, 10 years old

Eight Little Fires

Eight little fires
glowing in flame from door to door you'll find them a miracle they proclaim

Eight little fires
Whose story you'll tell while spinning round your dreidel and latkes frying you do smell

Eight little fires
standing tall and bright filling us with hope in the darkness of the night

Eight little fires
for all of us to see reminding us of who we are
and who we ought to be.

by Shoshana Binder, 10 years old

Eight Days a Year

Chanukah is the holiday of light.
Every year it zooms by like a rocket in the sky.
I take Chanukah differently,
I take it gradually,

I want to enjoy and remember,
Every breathtaking sight and scent during Chanukah.
There are many different sights.
Each is exquisite and dazzling in its own way.

My favorite part of Chanukah is,
Seeing my family around the table.
They all have astronomical sized smiles on their faces.
Their faces all gleam in the light of the chanukiah.

The shamash stands tall.
It's alone but it's in the centre.
The flicker of the shamash
Sparkles in all of our eyes.

I can't explain in words,
This extraordinary and remarkable holiday.
Chanukah is more than just stories games and presents,
It's the time of light, happiness, joy and family for all Jews who walk on earth.

Chanukah

Chanukah...
What does it mean?
It is a miracle I wish I could have seen,
The Jews found a container of oil for one day to burn,
How could it last? was their concern,
And yet for eight days the flame did glow,
This was a way to show,
For all the Jews and nations to know,
That God brings light and can take it away,
According to how much we beseech and pray,
And that's why thousands were beaten by a few,
And that was a miracle of Chanukah too!
If only we had the everlasting light,
To bring peace in the world without friction or fight,
Where each man would love one another,
Like parents, cousins, sister or brother,
The peace of light that shines from our hearts,
Would bring the glow of love spreading to the world in all parts,
And the miracle of Chanukah would rekindle once more,
And the light of love of mankind would open every closed door.

by Menashe Kestenbaum, 13 years old

On the Meaning of Chanukah

In the age of the Maccabees a single day's worth of oil burned in the Temple for eight whole days, read the teacher to his students

The oil couldn't have sustained the light and heat for so many consecutive hours, a student argued

Can a man's hope and faith be measured with any accuracy?
probed the teacher

No. But a man's faith can be shaken like the apple on a branch of a tree, declared the student

And is yours so easily shaken?
the teacher asked compassionately

It has been, as is true for most of us, the student responded, undefeated

The teacher then lit a match and invited the student to imagine that its flame signified some untangible immeasurable good he could aspire to

The student watched intently as the flame bonfired receded and went out

Having witnessed the predictability of science he was not yet convinced of the meaning of his teacher's lesson

But sometime later the student remembered the flame and the buoyant belief he had invested in its brief light

A belief he had stored in the Ark of his soul to secure there as a covenant

It was then he decided

That the flame was a symbol he could understand
by Carol Lipszyc

The Chanukah Menorah: A Light Unto The Nations

In a world where lust for wealth
Determines what is done
Where human rights are nuisances
When contracts must be won

Where governments are blind
To suffering that abounds
Shaking hands with despots
For oil that's in the ground

But Chanukah is different
When the menorah shines
It beams a light of freedom
And hope for all mankind

It makes us all remember
The miracle long ago
When no oil could be found
To keep the lamp aglow

But the lamp kept on burning
Eight long days and nights
Just like the human spirit
In darkness there is light

Each night the menorah's lit
We honor all mankind
And show those evil rulers
Its flame will always shine

Faith Till The End

A struggle, a long hard fight a fight to survive, to stand up for what we believe.
Not to be put down,
not to be pushed around because of our religion, race or appearance
but to live a life we deserve.
We earned the right to live in peace and capture beautiful sights you and I can cherish, cherish in our hearts
where no one can take it away.
For them to dream and us to relive for us to do and not to say or wish, but to act upon what and how you want things to be.
That's what made us.
That's what brought us here now.
To relive and pass down memories to our youngsters about how we managed, fought and accomplished things for them, our children.
To live a secure, happy life where they can be safe and not worry about what others will think.
So they can grow up strong and powerful so they can protect their families from what this world is coming to.
Without the worries we grew up with.

That's what Chanukah means to me in my own way in my own opinion in my own words.

חנוכה שמח

מהדהודי מתיישן

מלים נוכריות נשמעות
אין סגה להתרגש.
תמיהות ברחובות,
עדיין זאת ניתן לשאת.
יוון-צלם זאוס בכל אתר,
מתנוסס בראש חוצות
וגמנסיון, והפודרום,
מחזה מקובל במקומנו!
ובהם מציגים לראוה תאוות-בשרם
סונדים להדרו
נתבייש היהודי שבתוכו, הוכפשו פניו
הגביר צעדו אל בית -מדרשו
לשאוב מתעצומות כחו.

חנוכה

נרות חנוכה דולקים ומבהיקים
מחממים את הבית.
ומזכירים לנו נסים גדולים
שקרו ליהודים בימי המקבים
המכבים נצחו את היוונים הרשעים
ה' נתן רבים בידי המעטים
נקו את בית המקדש- היקל ה'
פך שמן קטן השפיק לשמונה ימים
ובזכותו אנו שמחים וחוגגים
בחוץ קר, שלג לבן נופל
בבית חם, נרות דולקים
ומזכירים לנו נסים גדולים.

by Esther Feldman, 12 years old

חנוכה,

ברחוב עברתי
ושירים שמעתי
וראיתי בחלונות
חנוכיות דולקות
באותו רגע
דיכאון ירד עלי
הלואי ויכולתי
לחגוג חנוכה עם ילדי
אולי נתראה עוד
אולי יבוא היום
על קידוש השם הם נהרגו
מעטים היו ורבים נצחו.

המכבים

חנוכה חג של חרות.
חג של עצמאות
המכבים התמודדו,
ונלחמו עד שהצליחו.
לא היה קל לעמוד על דעתם,
עבדו את ה' כדי להיות עם.
מעטים נגד רבים.
גיבורים ומאמינים.
נלחמו בחכמה,
התפללו ב"כוונה".
עם אחד בלב אחד.
עמדו ביחד כדי להחזיר את האור לישראל
נס גדול היה שם.

Technion overlooks Haifa

By EDGAR ASHER
Israel Correspondent

Part 2

If one asks the average Israeli to name an institute in Haifa that enjoys an international reputation, the chances are that he will answer, the Technion.

The Israel Institute of Technology – The Technion – is one of two main centres of higher education in northern Israel. Established in Haifa in 1924, it was the first institute of higher learning to be opened in the country. It has faculties for engineering, architecture, town planning, medicine and life sciences. Seventy-five percent of engineers working in Israel today are graduates of the Technion as are the CEOs of many of Israel's leading high-tech companies.

The student population now stands at over 10,000 with almost 2,400 students graduating each year from 19 faculties.

"Today we cannot keep pace with the demand for engineers," says Emanuel Shimoni, the director of public affairs of the institute. "The rapid expansion in science-based industries has meant that we have to expand all the time to provide graduates to this most successful sector of Israel's economy.

"We also established in 1991 'centres of excellence,' to support Israel's future technological and scientific development. The centres are flexible associations of scientists who come together from a varied background and experience to solve complex scientific problems."

The institute currently has nine centres dealing with such subjects as biotechnology, superconductivity, software technology, protein engineering and molecular medicine.

In 1923, after visiting the original Technion campus, Albert Einstein returned to Germany to found the world's first Technion society. Today there are 13 Technion societies around the world providing both financial and academic help to the institute. The societies are also instrumental in making their local communities aware of developments at the Technion.

The Canadian Technion Society has always been in the forefront of the institute's 'Friends.' There are society chapters in Toronto, Montreal, Winnipeg and Vancouver.

Because the Canadian Friends of the Technion has been so active, the institution recently opened the new Art Eggleton Canadian Centre for Molecular Medicine Research, which is headed by Canadian scientist, Dr. Karl Skorecki.

On leaving the Technion, one can see from many vantage points the panorama of Haifa Port below. At present, due to security considerations and the danger of injury, one cannot just enter the harbor area and wander about to view the day to day activities that are part of any busy port. However, this will slowly change in the future, as the city and the sea are reunified and part of the port area is given over to sea recreation and general tourism.

"Over the next 20 years a total of 80 acres of land will be reclaimed from the sea to the eastern side of the present harbor complex," says Joseph Rosenthal the spokesperson for the Haifa Peace Port, as it is officially known.

"In the first stage, over the next few years, the central part of the port will be opened to tourist development and a marina will be built immediately below the German Colony, thus allowing visitors to walk through a complex of gardens from the Louis Promenade, high up on the Carmel, to the edge of the sea, some two kilometres away."

There is opposition to the plans to build the marina, as some experts say the reclamation of land will stop the natural flow of the sea in the area and there will be silting. This theory is rejected by the developers of the project, who say that not only will the marina be built on solid bedrock, but that tests carried out at National Physical Laboratory in Teddington, England, show that there will be no degradation of the shore line.

All the infrastructure changes have to be made without interfering with the port's daily activities. Today Haifa handles 13 million tons of cargo annually, with a steady

We remember

As we look into the candles burning and bright
We remember the Jews, their victory and might.
The menorah was okay but the oil would not last
They needed some olives and they needed them fast.
At that moment a glistening miracle flew by
It said good luck, you can do it and goodbye.
The Jews sat and prayed when the lighting was done
They soon realized that it was they who had won.
The candles remained lit for the next eight days
The Jews rejoiced in many different ways.
At last the Jews were happy and free
And guess what?
One of those Jews was me.

annual growth of between five and 10 percent. Ashdod Port handles a little more each year than Haifa in total tonnage, but Haifa exceeds Ashdod as far as container traffic is concerned. In fact, Haifa's container port is one of the biggest in the Mediterranean. In 1996, 386,000 containers were processed in the port, more than double the quantity of containers handled 10 years earlier.

Nine hundred and fifty people are employed at the port and as a result of mechanization and modern cargo handling, the productivity per worker has significantly increased. In 1996, 35 percent of cargo at the port was container traffic, 17 percent was bulk grain and 14 percent oil.

"Although the port is increasing its cargo turnover, we had hoped for an even bigger increase as a result of business from Jordan following the peace accord," says Rosenthal rather wistfully. "Unfortunately, for a variety of political reasons, the expected increase did not materialize. However, it is quite clear to see that our port is in a perfect position to deal with Jordanian exports and imports from Europe and North America. I believe in time this will come about."

The history and development of shipping is an integral part of the history of the western world. It was from this region that ships of the Pharaohs, Canaanites and Phoenicians plied the Mediterranean. Two Haifa museums reflect two distinct views of Israel's history. One deals with the foundation of the modern state, seen from a maritime perspective, while the other goes back to the earliest example of maritime history.

The Clandestine Immigration and Naval Museum is near the western end of the Bat Galim Promenade. The major part of the museum is located in the hull of the appropriately named vessel Af Al Pi Hen – In Spite Of. Within its hull is told the story of how vessels, like the Af Al Pi Hen broke the British blockade of the Jews fleeing Nazi persecution. It also tells the story of the Israel Navy, of which Haifa is an integral part.

The second museum, the National Maritime Museum, was founded in 1953 and located some two hundred metres from the Clandestine Immigration museum. The museum was founded by Lt.-Cmdr. Arie Ben Eli, who was also, until his death in 1980, the first director of the museum.

"The original basis of the museum was Ben Eli's own private collection," explains curator Esther Joseph. "We added important pieces to our collection from donations as well as from maritime archaeological excavations on the sea shore and under the sea. We cover over 5,000 years of maritime history with special emphasis on the Eastern Mediterranean."

Joseph points out with some pride a remarkably preserved and rare fourth-century BCE, 465-kilo bronze battering ram that came from a Phoenician warship. The unique ram was found in 1980 in the Bay of Atlit, just south of Haifa.

The museum also has on view three Egyptian funerary boats from about 2000 BCE and there is a fine collection of model boats constructed mainly in the museum's own workshop from contemporary drawings and coin inscriptions. The earliest model is based on a seagoing Egyptian vessel from the reign of Pharaoh Sahure who reigned about 2500 BCE.

Haifa has nine other museums in addition to the two described above. They include modern and ancient art museums, a prehistory museum, a train museum, a Japanese art museum, a railway museum, a grain museum and an edible oil museum. The city also has one of the most attractive zoological gardens in Israel.

In keeping with the city's plan to open up and develop the beaches, the municipality has started to develop the Dado, Zamir and Ha-Carmel beaches at the southern entry of the city. For local people with cars, the beaches are first class. But tourists face the problem of the present lack of hotel accommodation in the immediate area of the beaches, as all the higher standard hotels are located on the Carmel, and between them they offer just over 1,000 rooms. New hotels are being built including a Holiday Inn and a Hilton. A manager of one of Haifa's larger hotels has said, "I don't believe tourists bring hotels, I believe hotels bring tourists."

Already built and operating, adjoining the site of the new proposed Hilton Hotel at the southern entrance to the city, is a state-of-the-art convention and exhibition centre that has facilities for up to 3,000 people. Within a few months, one of Israel's largest indoor shopping complexes is due to open in the same area.

Work is also scheduled to start to rebuild the rail terminal and bus station within walking distance of the convention centre and shopping complex. From this complex can be seen some of Israel's best known high-tech companies, such as Elbit, Fibronic, Elsint, IBM and Intel. They are all found in the Centre for Scientific Industries, known in Hebrew as Matam.

Haifa is clearly getting its act together. The elements needed to encourage tourism are all in place. Coordination and development are now the order of the day. Within a 60- kilometre radius of the city is some of Israel's most beautiful countryside, including the Kinneret (Sea of Galilee). Haifa is trying to project itself into the next millennium to become the city that is a 'must' to visit. There are many problems, but as in the past, Haifa will come through on top.

Chanukah

In one corner, an array of colored wax
Cyan, iridescent white and magenta
Dripping elegantly down the menorah's
Golden, sturdy and everlasting body.

In the corner opposite
Children playing without care
Colors twirling joyfully
On the four-sided top.

Symbols of our past
Standing in shining glory
Like Maccabees after VICTORY
Golden Menorah and Bright Green Dreidel.

Scents of oil invading the humid air
From the room next door
Inside, a woman
Frying hot brown latkes

The blazing red inferno
Giving heat to the Teflon pan –
As the Jewish faith
Gave strength to the Maccabees

Upstairs an old bearded man,
Telling one of his million tales
To young faces
Anxious and awaiting

Glimmering metal and blinding colors,
Sizzling latkes and stories galore
Chanukah is present –
With the love it brings.

Chanukah traditions, recipes vary around the world

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Did you know that on Chanukah, Moroccan Jews eat couscous with deep-fried chicken; that Russian Jews put a lump of sugar in a spoon, pour brandy over it, then set it alight and drop it in a glass of tea; and that North African Jews eat cabbage soup?

Those are just some of the fascinating tidbits you can pick up in Claudia Roden's The Book of Jewish Food (Knopf, 1997). The book is subtitled An odyssey from Samarkand to New York, and that is just what it is: customs, recipes and folklore from wherever Jews have settled over the centuries.

Ashkenazi, Sephardi, European gourmet and Indian dainties, all the way to China and the New World, this cookbook-cum-history-cum-sociology-cum-folklore book would be a wonderful present for anyone who loves food. And who doesn't?

POLLO FRITTO

This Tuscan way of cooking small pieces of chicken has become a Chanukah specialty in Italy.

8 small pieces of chicken, cut from the leg or breast Juice of 1 lemon salt and pepper
flour
1 egg, lightly beaten light vegetable oil for frying, about 1 inch deep

Marinate the chicken pieces for 1 hour in the lemon juice, a little salt and pepper. Just before you are ready to eat, roll them all in flour, then in beaten egg (prepare a soup plate of each and the chicken pieces can all be in at the same time). Heat the oil in a heavy pot and deep-fry the chicken till golden. If the oil is too hot, the batter will burn before the chicken is done.

Tunisian style chicken a Chanukah specialty

If you want to make a large quantity, you may reheat in the oven. Serves 2-4.

Variations:

The Tunisian "Livornese" version – poulet en beignets – is a chicken cut in small pieces marinated in a mixture of 3 tbsp. of extra-virgin olive oil, the juice of 1 lemon, 2 crushed garlic cloves, 3 tbsp. finely chopped flat-leafed parsley, salt and pepper, then dipped in a batter made with one-third cup flour beaten with 1 egg and a little water – just enough to make it creamy – plus salt and pepper. Deep-fry in medium-hot oil and serve with lemon quarters.

PASCHKA (Cream cheese mold)

1¼ lb. curd or cream cheese
3½ oz. unsalted butter, softened
4 tbsp. sour cream
2 egg yolks
½ cup superfine (icing) sugar or to taste zest of 1 to 1½ lemons few drops vanilla extract
¼ cup coarsely chopped almonds
¼ cup mixed raisins and/or chopped crystallized fruit and citrus peel.

Put all the ingredients except the almonds, raisins and crystallized fruit in the food processor and blend to a smooth cream. Taste to adjust the amount of sugar and flavorings. Add the almonds, raisins and fruit and blend briefly so that they are well mixed.

Pour into a small bowl lined with plastic wrap and cover with another piece of wrap (this makes it easier to unmold). Leave in refrigerater overnight. Unmold and serve in thin slices.

Variations:

You can freeze the paschka and turn it into an ice cream. Take it out of the freezer one-half hour before serving.

You can make it plain, without fruit or almonds. Serves 8.

Reflections

Through the flicker of life-light
I see.
Surrounded by the warm glow of Chanukah candles,
Shining so a million eyes can lift up,
To see,
A reflection –

Faces like yours
Maybe rounder or bigger,
Images blurred by steady streams of smoke,
As matches are extinguished and flames burn,
Dripping wax in intricate patterns.

We learn –
Even through the "grated potatoes and one large egg," and cut knuckles,
we learn about strength.
See it over there –

Reflections.

See yourself too,
Understand the path, the way,
Which lights the road for us –
Year after year after year, and say Thank You.

The Potato Menorah
Many years ago, a very simple, inexpensive way to celebrate the candle lighting was to cut thick slices of potatoes, put a small opening in the centre and place the Chanukah candles. Naturally, one piece of potato would be higher than the rest to act as a Shamus. The potato, because it is moist, also extinguishes the candle as it burns down, acting as a safety device.

Heart smart foods a delight

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Everyone loves the thought of gourmet food. The problem, of course, is finding the recipes to whip up these concoctions at home.

Heart and Soul Cuisine from the Estates of Sunnybrook, by David Adjay and Janice Holley, with photographs by Curtis Trent (Estates of Sunnybrook, and the Sunnybrook Health Science Centre Heart and Circulation Program, 1997) is one great way to get started.

There is even an added bonus — the recipes are all designed to be good for your heart. Vegetables are grilled and served with an assortment of incredible sounding vinaigrette dressings; instead of whipping cream, you find evaporated skim milk; and herbs and spices are used liberally.

We tend to think that "healthy" does not go along with such adjectives as "yummy" or "delectable". But what could be bad about lemon-scented potato hash; steamed Florida red snapper with saffron, tomatoes, basil and thyme; or sun-dried cherry biscotti?

A great many of the recipes are not kosher, but most can be adapted for the kosher kitchen. Here are a few that not only sound great, but can be used to liven up your Chanukah table.

SWEET PEA PANCAKES

1 cup all-purpose flour
1 tbsp. baking powder
½ tsp. salt
1 cup egg substitute
1 cup evaporated skim milk
½ cup sweet pea puree
¼ cup chopped fresh parsley pinch of nutmeg
⅛ tsp. black pepper

Sift together flour, baking powder and salt. In a large bowl, whisk together remaining ingredients. Fold in flour mixture. Spray a large non-stick pan lightly with non-stick cooking spray. For each pancake, spoon about 2 tbsp. batter into the pan. When bubbles form and edges are light brown, flip pancake and leave until fully cooked, 2 minutes. Keep warm, and serve as soon as possible.

For the sweet pea puree: In a blender or food processor, puree 1 cup sweet peas with 1 tbsp. hot water until smooth. Strain through a fine strainer. Reserve liquid and discard solids. Serves 6.

LEMON PUDDING CAKE

⅔ cup granulated sugar
1½ cups skim milk
½ cup all-purpose flour
⅛ tsp. salt
2 tbsp. margarine, melted
1 tbsp. grated lemon rind
⅓ cup lemon juice
1 tsp. vanilla extract
3 eggs, separated
1 tbsp. granulated sugar

Preheat oven to 350.

Lightly spray an 8-in. square baking pan with non-stick cooking spray. In a large mixing bowl, combine sugar, milk, flour, salt, margarine, lemon rind and juice, vanilla, and egg yolks. Beat until smooth. Set aside.

In a small mixing bowl, beat egg whites until soft peaks form. Add remaining sugar and beat until stiff.

Mix one-third of whites into lemon mixture. Fold in remaining whites. Pour batter into prepared pan. Bake in a water bath 45 to 50 minutes. Serve warm. Serves 10.

YOGURT AND HONEY-LEMON DRESSING

½ cup non-fat yogurt
3 tbsp. stoneground mustard
3 tbsp. honey
1 lemon, zest and juice
¼ tsp. chopped fresh mint
¼ tsp. kosher salt
⅛ tsp. black pepper

Combine yogurt, mustard and honey in a large bowl. Add lemon zest, juice and mint. Adjust seasoning with salt and pepper. Makes 1 cup.

For The One Who Thought To Set Aside The Oil

If the future
comprehends
the past,
then I will plant a seedling tree and never live to taste the fruit.

Some waged war with spears and swords
Some prayed and some negotiated
Some rebelled and some assimilated.

But since the future
comprehends
the past
I hid away a flask of oil.

This is the task of the righteous:
To prepare for the future
To plan for the future
To drag the past into the future
So that the future comprehends the past.

And from such planning:
Miracles
And joy.
Like a flame
a bright dancing flame that never extinguishes.
Like a child's eyes.

Herbs liven up veal brisket

By NAOMI ARBIT
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

VEAL BRISKET

2 ½ pound veal brisket, fat removed
1 envelope onion soup mix
½ cup kosher dry white wine
2 tablespoons tomato paste
2 cups water
2 teaspoons paprika
1 teaspoon dried rosemary
1-2 cloves garlic, minced fresh ground pepper to taste
6 red new potatoes, peeled and quartered
6 carrots, cut into 2-inch diagonal slices
2 tablespoons flour or arrowroot
¼ cup water, white wine or flat beer

Place the veal in a roasting pan, top side up. Brown in the broiler on both sides until golden brown. Drain off any fat from the pan. Combine the onion soup mix and water and pour over the meat.

In a small bowl, mix the paprika, rosemary, garlic and pepper. Spread the tomato paste over the top of the brisket and sprinkle with the seasonings. Cover the meat and place in a 325-degree oven. Roast for one hour. Turn the roast over once during the next hour, basting with the juices. Add the potatoes and carrots, sprinkle with a little paprika; cover and cook 30 to 45 minutes longer or until meat and vegetables are tender.

Drain the juices from the roaster and remove the fat. Pour into a small saucepan. Blend the flour with ½-cup water, wine or beer and whisk over low heat until smooth. Stir constantly. Cook until mixture thickens and coats a spoon.

Carve cooled meat into 1/2-inch slices, cutting diagonally against the grain of the meat. (You may want to reheat the meat after carving.) Arrange sliced meat on a heated platter surrounded with potatoes and carrots. Spoon some gravy over the top and pass the remaining gravy separately. Serves 6-8.

SYMBOL COOKIES

1 cup butter or margarine
1 cup sugar
1 large egg
1 tsp. vanilla
3 tsp. baking powder
3 cups all-purpose flour
3 tbsp. milk or orange juice

Using an electric mixer, beat butter and sugar in a bowl until creamy. Beat in egg and vanilla. In a small bowl, combine flour and baking powder. On low speed, gradually beat flour mixture into butter mixture until combined. Add milk or orange juice; beat until dough masses around beaters, around 2 minutes. Divide dough into thirds; wrap in waxed paper and chill for 30 minutes.

Roll out each third of dough on a lightly floured surface to desired thickness. Cut into shapes. Place cookies on an ungreased baking sheet. Bake in a 400 degree oven for 10 miutes, or until cookies spring back when lightly touched. Let cool on baking sheet for a few minutes. Transfer to rack to cool completely. Decorate as desired.

The First Chanukah

A Chanukah of firsts – first candles come with first smiles, reminding us of all those before you,
who smiled for the first time, once.

A Chanukah of eyes opened wide, flames reach as high as you can see,
a warm glow fills your tiny world, smells never known, tastes to anticipate – one day,
when you're older.

A Chanukah of light, to remind you of the light that greeted you,
and surrounded you,
when you were born.

You travelled far to see this light, to dance in its warmth,
to make it brighter.

On this first Chanukah of many,
it reflects in your smiling eyes, and tells us we've come so far,
to be here together.

by Leonard Lewkowict

Reminiscence of Chanukah

The candles lit up my mother's face
Who knows what miracle she had in her mind
That night the wind did not blow out the flames
It was the beast's breath that reversed our fate
I inherited the task to light the candles anew
For my children and theirs to continue
The tradition of Chanukah, a vision of hope
If miracles exist, yearning must stop!
Imagination brings back the magic night
When for the last time my mother lit the Chanukah light
The colored candles I picture in my dream
Chanukah wonders I lost in life stream
Deprived for years the Simchah of light
I loomed out of the darkness guided by the stars
The candles weren't there to show me the way
The last Chanukah at home for ever to stay?
Oh, Hope! You are a treasure, miracles come true!
For my children and theirs, as in my youth,
We play with the dreidel, we sing childhood songs
The room is warm, a rainbow, the flames
Outside winter, the snow gleams bright
The magic of Chanukah rejoices my heart.

Moments of the present

GENERATION TO GENERATION

Like the tides that surge and recede by dint of beckoning forces, our lives too are shaped by energies and currents that we mostly feel, but can neither see nor understand.

However, during the first 10 days of Tishrei, the days of introspection and of self-assessment, the passage of our years becomes somehow clearer to us. For religious and irreligious alike, Rosh Hashanah reminds us of time's constant melancholy tug upon the forward momentum of our lives.

Time – and the awareness of it – are ever present factors that shape human life. And how we relate to time is an ever present factor that shapes individual lives.

The late Rabbi Joseph B. Soloveitchik wrote that consciousness of time, along with consciousness of place, were the two fundamental dimensions of kedushah, of holiness. But he pointed out there were two categories of time-consciousness: qualitative and quantitative. Only the former, qualitative time-consciousness, he emphasized, was the means to a life of higher meaning and purpose, of commitment and creativity.

Editorial

Qualitative time-consciousness, he wrote, was "the appreciation of the enormous implications inherent in the fleeting moments of the present. No fraction of time, however infinite, should slip through the fingers, left unexploited; for eternity may depend upon the brief moment."

The above photo by Paul Pascal, one of the winners of The CJN Rosh Hashanah photo contest, conveys a sense of qualitative time-consciousness in a poignant and almost poetic way.

The contrast between the timeless, innocent, endearing little boy and the timeless, ancient craggy stones of the Wall enables us to see and helps us to understand what we usually can only feel, what Rabbi Soloveitchik referred to as the "enormous implications in the fleeting moments of the present."

The page of the calendar turns to 5758 and we will pray that no longer will infinite fractions of time slip through our fingers.

Bibi speaks to The CJN

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu gave a Rosh Hashanah interview in his Jerusalem office to Edgar Asher, The CJN's Israel correspondent. The conversation covered many of the present political, social and economic issues that affect the Jewish people in Israel and in the Diaspora.

CJN: Mr Netanyahu, would you give your views concerning the crisis over the occupation of the house in Ras Al Amud, following the Sept. 18 agreement with U.S. millionaire Irving Moskowitz, which resulted in the three families leaving his east Jerusalem property.

NETANYAHU: Israelis have the right to live anywhere within the sovereign territory of Israel. But in the case of Jerusalem we tend to build neighborhoods in particular places. There will be a new neighborhood in Har Choma, thousands of houses for both Jews and Arabs. Har Choma is empty and very large. It is government policy to permit private contractors to build at Har Choma — we haven't decided to build in Ras Al Amud.

The question of the law of eviction and protection of property is clear, but the law is not so clear about national security risks and this we have to consider also. We want to defuse the tension and preserve the unity and rights of the people. It is a complicated equation, but I think it is achievable.

Sharon Home renamed in honor of Kanee family

By MYRON LOVE
Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG – In 1994-95, the Sharon Home, Winnipeg's Jewish nursing home, suffered a double loss.

First, its president, Bill Goldberg, was killed in an auto accident in Australia. Then, just a few months later, Dr. Henry Faintuch, the home's longtime dedicated executive director, was felled in a freak accident while on vacation in Florida. He was left permanently disabled.

As he has in so many other situations, Sol Kanee took over the leadership of the home at that trying time and with the help of dedicated staff and other lay leaders, made sure it continued to function on an even keel.

The octogenarian Kanee had accepted the position of chairman of the board of the home in 1992, continuing a family involvement with the Sharon Home that goes back 60 years. Since 1937, the Kanee family has played a dominant role in the fortunes of the home.

Recently, the board of directors of the home recognized those contributions by officially changing the name of the institution to the Kanee Centre of the Sharon Home. The new name and plaque were unveiled by Kanee; his brother, Dr. Ben Kanee, who lives in Vancouver; and their sister, Dr. Ricky Kanee Schachter from Toronto, at a ceremony attended by several other members of the Kanee family who flew in from Toronto, Vancouver and Minneapolis.

The Kanee association with the home began when Sam and Rose Kanee and their family moved to Winnipeg. Sam had come to Canada as a young man before World War I and established himself as a successful merchant in Melville, Sask. In Winnipeg, he and his sons, Sol and Abe, owned and operated the Soo Line Mills.

Sam was recruited to join the city's business district canvassing Jewish businesspeople for money to support the home. He also served on the board of directors.

Kanee's late brother, Abe, more than anyone else other than perhaps Faintuch, was identified with the home. For 26 years, Abe served as president, and working closely with Faintuch, built the institution into what it is today. Under their joint tenure, the home underwent the greatest changes in its physical appearance, culture and character.

"Abe admired and encouraged progress and growth," recalled Harold Buchwald. "Under his leadership, the home evolved from a charity board of the Jewish Old Folks Home – as it was then known – by his friend and business associate Essae Greenberg. He was an inspired recruit, said Buchwald in describing the role of the Kanee family in the life of the Sharon Home.

"Sam had a strong sense of social responsibility," said Buchwald. "He respected and encouraged new ideas. He served on the board for 14 years culminating in the presidency in 1951-52. He was responsible for the appointment of Faintuch as the administrator of the home. The cornerstone of this building was dedicated to Sam."

Sam's wife, Rose, easily matched and possibly exceeded her husband's dedication to the home. She served for over 20 years as secretary-treasurer of the ladies auxiliary and proved herself to be a fundraiser par excellence. She held fundraising teas four time a year in her St. Cross home. She was a frequent visitor to the shelter into a personal care home."

While Abe was a prominent figure in his hometown, Sol Kanee has gone about his work quietly on the world stage. In the words of Rabbi Israel Singer, director general of the World Jewish Congress, Kanee is probably better known in Ottawa, New York and Israel than he is in Winnipeg.

Although the family members all received their share of praise, the afternoon truly belonged to Sol Kanee. The extent of his influence can be measured by some of the people who came in especially for the event. In addition to Singer, these included Gerald Bouey, the former governor of the Bank of Canada (of which Kanee was a long timeboard member), Mitchell Sharp and Doug Young (most recently Canada's defence minister before his defeat in the last election). Also in the audience were Senator and former Manitoba premier Duff Roblin, Ben Hewak, chief justice of the Manitoba Court of Queen's Bench, and Winnipeg MPs Dr. Rey Pagtakhan and Reg Alcock.

Rabbi Singer described Kanee as one of the most important behind the scenes figures in modern Jewish history. From the creation of the State of Israel to the resettlement of Holocaust survivors to the exodus from the former Soviet Union, Kanee was there leading the efforts to pave the way.

"Sol has a calming influence on people, as do central bankers," said Rabbi Singer. "I like to think of Sol as the 'central banker' of the Jewish people over the past 50 years. He has continually brought a sense of order out of chaos. He was the only man who could convince Sam Bronfman of anything."

Rabbi Singer noted that Kanee has never been one to seek public acclaim for himself. He has never wanted to be number 1. He has always sought to cajole others, whom he felt were more capable, to play leadership roles.

Kanee Schachter spoke on behalf of the family, praising her parents' vision and dedication and the family's leadership in and sense of responsibility to the community.

Jewish families gather from across southern Ontario

NIAGARA FALLS, Ont. — At the end of the recent Southern Ontario Family Weekend in Niagara Falls, participants agreed that they enjoyed meeting Jewish families from other small communities.

Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region (CJC), organizes retreats across the province so that families living in small communities can come together to discuss issues of communal concern, and celebrate Shabbat.

"My family had a fabulous time," said Rosalie Samosh of St. Catharines. "There were top-quality speakers and programs."

Families from Guelph, Barrie, Midhurst and St. Catharines braved the first major snowfall of the season to travel to B'nai Jacob Synagogue in Niagara Falls. Program participants included: Rabbi Nathan Liberman of B'nai Jacob; Dr. Michael Sobol, co-chair of the Ontario region's small communities committee; Rachel Turkienicz, an educator; Jennifer Turack, the former CJC Ontario region director of Community Services and Youth Activities; CJC Family Outreach coordinator Leanne Rosen; Ryan Hass, national shaliach of Canadian Young Judaea; and university students Aaron Weinroth and Sara Price.

Somi Feiner of Midhurst (a community north of Barrie) said that she and her family could not wait to get there. "We were very impressed with the weekend, and especially enjoyed participating in discussions about the Bible and its relevance to today, and the Israel at 50 program."

Weinroth came away from the weekend "with an appreciation of how people living in small communities have to try so much harder to create a Jewish environment for their families."

For those living in Ontario small communities who wish to participate in the program, contact Rosen at 635-2883, ext. 139.

Fort St. John's Harris vows to complete religious trek

By BARRY SHAINBAUM
Special to The CJN

PINK MOUNTAIN, B.C. — Before packing my camera for a magazine assignment in northern British Columbia, I decided that I also wanted to interview some isolated Jews in the region for a photographic essay in The CJN. Armed with a list of farblonjet — lost in the wilderness — CJN subscribers, I phoned Greg Harris, whose home in Fort St. John was a "mere" 200 miles from my destination, Fort Nelson.

The call elicited an unexpected response when Harris revealed that he wasn't "quite Jewish" yet. He had been adopted at six months by a Halifax Catholic family but when he was just seven, and a nun declared in class that only Catholic children could go to heaven, he was indignant. Why wouldn't his Anglican friends be welcomed into heaven? he wondered.

As he matured, the questions became more insistent until eventually he gave up Catholicism and began to embrace Judaism. Now in his 40s, and transferred by his employer for a three-year stint in Fort St. John, he struggles to maintain a Jewish lifestyle and plans to undergo conversion after returning to Halifax next year.

Intrigued, and with my interest further piqued when Harris mentioned that he keeps a pet wolf, I suggested an interview. We agreed to get together several days later in Pink Mountain, a hamlet midway between Fort Nelson and Fort St. John.

I borrowed a friend's car for the drive from Fort Nelson to Pink Mountain. Harris arrived in a pick-up truck accompanied by his 18-year-old son and the wolf, whom I regarded with appropriate respect.

Harris' first words were, "I've been wishing I had another Jew to talk to."

The wolf, fluffy and domesticated, appeared as friendly as a dog, but his tolerance level was lower than "man's best friend" . Harris said. A warning growl would signify displeasure if he were thwarted.

Pet wolves are not unusual in the area he noted, adding, "People up here have all kinds of strange pets."

Preferring privacy for our first meeting, we agreed, rather than go into the local diner, to talk together inside the truck under the watchful eye of the wolf.

Harris, very articulate, explained the circumstances leading to his acceptance of Judaism.

When he was only nine, he challenged the Catechism, and at 16, rejected the Trinity — union of Father, Son and Holy Spirit — trying his teachers past endurance. He was thrown out of class he says, and remembers standing outside the church shouting, "From now on it's you and me, G-d, nobody else!"

At 17, he went to sea for 13 years, and on board ship would often seek out secluded spots where he could have "conversations" with G-d.

When he was 30, he joined an oil company as a process operator.

About five years ago, intensifying his spiritual search, he contacted Rabbi Laibe Hoffman at Shaar Shalom Congregation in Halifax. When he described his gut feeling, the firm belief in communicating directly with G-d, not through an intermediary, she agreed that he leaned toward the Jewish concept.

He was invited to a shmooze group at the synagogue, was welcomed and felt right at home. He started to teach himself Hebrew, "grooming myself to become Jewish." His adoptive mother accepted his decision, saying that if he were happy and led a good life, it was no problem.

On the eve of Yom Kippur he had an extraordinary experience.

He had finally located his birth mother in Dartmouth, and she came with her sister to meet him for the first time just when he was on his way to shul for Kol Nidre. When he told her that he was committed to Judaism his aunt said, "You're not the only one in the family. Your great grandmother was Jewish."

He remembered something he had read, a concept called Gilgul. "A Jewish soul born into any other religion will eventually find its way back to Judaism."

Before he could make it to the mikvah, he was transferred.

In Fort St. John where he has been living with his family, he has koshered the kitchen, put up a mezuzah, reads Torah, prays three times a day and observes Shabbat. He eats matzah at Pesach.

Considerable support comes from friends in Halifax, including shul members Alice Frost and Paul Mandel who send him literature and transcripts from visiting rabbis. "That's how I survive," he says.

"I know what I am, who I am. I never think of giving up Judaism. When I return to Halifax, "I'll get my trip to the mikvah!"

Written with assistance from Miriam Chinsky.

Dead Sea Scrolls can be viewed on CD-ROM

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — For much of the 50 years since their discovery, access to the Dead Sea Scrolls was jealously guarded by often competing scholars convinced they held revelatory information on Judaism and early Christianity.

Six years ago, the Israel Antiquities Authority (IAA) released all the remaining unpublished scrolls to the world at large.

Today, any member of the Jewish Public Library (JPL) can drop in to its new multimedia centre and view a set of three compact discs on which are high-resolution images of all of the thousands of fragments of the 800 or so scrolls – at no cost. The set comprises over 6,000 annotated black and white images, cross-referenced in several ways, plus informative text and related publications.

So if one wanted to, say, find the relevant fragments containing a certain biblical passage or key words, they can be called up in seconds. More learned researchers can summon up those found in a particular cave or by date.

Features include the ability to enhance legibility by enlarging or removing background fuzziness. Pages can be downloaded onto a diskette or printed out.

The technology not only makes reading the pieces easier, but also permits a new means of physically fitting this massive jigsaw puzzle together because of the manipulability of the images.

The images were digitized from original photos taken of the fragments in the 1950s and '60s when they were in better condition than now.

The JPL believes it is, if not the only institution in Montreal owning a copy of the new CD-ROM set, the only one making it available to the public.

One reason even the universities don't have it, is the price: about $2,490 (US). However, as a library that prides itself on holding the largest public collection of Judaica in North America, including a growing software collection, the JPL felt it had an "obligation" to acquire it, said marketing head Ira Lax.

The Dead Sea Scrolls: Electronic Reference Library Vol. 1 is published by Oxford University Press and Dutch-based E.J. Brill, which were granted exclusive rights by the IAA to produce the CD series, edited by Vancouver native Timothy Lim.

Lim, a lecturer in the scrolls and Christian origins in the University of Edinburgh's (Uof E) department of Hebrew and Old Testament studies, was the keynote speaker of the JPL's Jewish Book Month.

At 37, the Oxford-educated Lim is considered on of the world's authorities of the scrolls and is one of the organizers of an international conference on the scrolls next May at UofE.

The primary aim of the conference is to gain a clear idea of the scrolls' place in the Judaism of the Second Temple period, particularly around the turn of the common era. Scholars will be asking themselves if, perhaps, their understanding of early Judaism has been distorted by the scrolls' chance discovery and the intense academic interest in them.

There is some question now about how representative the Qumran community that owned the scrolls was of the Judaism of that time. Some suspect the community and its writings were peripheral to the mainstream community.

"Is the Qumran community simply one of several fringe sectarian groups, about whom we now happen to know more than we do about others?" Lim asks.

Lim believes the scrolls have contributed a great deal to the study of the Hebrew Bible including passages not previously known, but he deplores the hype surrounding the scrolls.

'The Dead Sea Scrolls have not yielded the revolutionary results claimed by their popular propagandists," he said. "They are, nevertheless, sensational in the more limited sense of having already contributed to so many areas of biblical and religious studies, and it is in this context that they should be celebrated in this 50th anniversary," he said.

Flood of new texts

With the flood of new texts and data, Lim thinks no one should be "too dogmatic about the provenance, content and interpretation" of the scrolls.

The scrolls have shed light on the diversity of Judaism before the destruction of the Temple in 70 BCE. "But Orthodox Jews have hitherto ignored this subject, since the defining moment for them is Rabbinic Judaism which postdates this period."

The CD-ROM database is but one example of the increasing use of the latest scientific and technological tools to scrolls research, that includes DNA testing.

"The latest digital computer technology is making such tasks as cross-referencing, interpretation and comparisons much easier and faster than ever before," said Lim, who, incidentally, receives no royalty on the CD-ROM's sales.

It also democratizes the controversy over the scrolls, allowing anyone to decide what they mean, provided they are proficient in reading ancient Hebrew and Aramaic.

Iran displays mixed signals on moderation

By GIL SEDAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Iran appears eager to mend fences with other countries —but Israel, for the time being, is not among them.

Analysis

Hosting a recent conference of Islamic nations, Tehran signalled that it wanted to improve relations with several Arab countries in an effort to overcome years of hostility that date back in some cases to Iran's 1979 Islamic Revolution.

Iranian President Mohammed Khatami announced at a news conference that he hoped to re-establish dialogue with the American people.

Since his election in May, Khatami has been viewed as more of a moderate than his predecessor, Hashemi Rafsanjani, particularly in the domestic arena.

But Iran-watchers have wondered whether his moderation would extend to foreign affairs.

Also subject to doubt was whether he would emerge victorious in the internal debates raging among Iranian leaders — a debate that pits Khatami against Rafsanjani and the country's supreme spiritual leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei.

At his news conference, Khatami expressed "great respect" for the "great people of the United States," and abandoned the hot rhetoric previous leaders directed at the American government.

By contrast, at the Islamic summit, Khamenei lambasted the United States, Israel and western civilization in general, where, he said, "Money, glutton and carnal desires are made the greatest aspiration."

It comes as no surprise, therefore, that the West is hesitant to draw conclusions too quickly about where Tehran is headed.

The U.S. State Department reacted cautiously to Khatami's news conference, saying that Washington remains "open to a dialogue" with Tehran.

But it categorically denied reports that the United States was engaged in any clandestine talks with Iran.

In Israel, as in Washington, Khatami's statements drew reserved applause.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said that Israel would always welcome any signs of moderation in Iran, but it was too early to tell whether there was indeed such a change.

Netanyahu said that Iran must still be regarded with caution because it continued to arm itself with weapons of mass destruction, and to support Middle East terrorism.

But some Iranian experts are more sanguine.

"This is a genuine attempt by the Iranian president to create a new, more positive image of Islam," Menashe Amir, head of Persian-language broadcasts on Voice of Israel Radio, said in an interview.

According to Amir, Khatami believes in an intercultural dialogue with the West that would allow Iran to break out of its international solitude.

But Amir cautioned that it was premature to believe that Iran's revolution was dying.

It may undergo a process of moderation, some of the leadership may change, but one should not underestimate the power of the Islamic Revolutionary Guard, he said.

In fact, Amir warned, Iran may use improved relations with the West to strengthen itself militarily — a process that should be viewed by Israel with great concern.

Uzi Landau, the hawkish chair of the Knesset's Foreign Affairs and Defence Committee, shares that view.

"We have no indication whatsoever that the Iranians even think" of improving relations with Israel, Landau said.

While he believes that Israel should maintain an official policy of encouraging moderates in Iran, he nonetheless believes that Israel should constantly be on the lookout, since Tehran has not yet adopted any concrete moderate policies.

If there is a change in Tehran, Landau added, it has not yet reached Israel.

Indeed, at the summit, the traditional anti-Israel stance prevailed. Moreover, Iran, which served as the summit's host, sought a strongly worded resolution against Israel and the peace process.

As it turned out, the communique issued at the end of the triennial meeting of the Organization of the Islamic Conference was moderated by some of the attendees, some of whom were unhappy with the harsh text prepared by Iran.

Just the same, the final declaration condemned Israel for practicing "state terrorism" and called for the creation of a Palestinian state with Jerusalem as its capital.

It also condemned terrorism, but supported the "struggles of people" against "alien domination" — which mirrored Iran's support of Hezbollah and Hamas in their fight against the Jewish state.

Summit members were also critical of Turkey, calling for a suspension of its expanding security ties with Israel — illustrated by the visit of Israeli Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai to Turkey.

In a sign of a growing breach with other Muslim countries, Turkish President Suleyman Demirel walked out of the conference to protest what a Turkish official called "attempts to force Turkey to end its political and military cooperation with Israel."

Tehran used the summit to boast that it was winning broad acceptance from the Islamic world.

And indeed, every member of the 55-nation organization came to Tehran.

But the level of attendance was another story: Only six of the 22 Arab states belonging to the conference were represented by heads of state.

Among those countries sending lower-level delegates were Egypt, Jordan and Saudi Arabia, all of which are key Arab allies of the United States.

Despite Tehran's pronouncements, the time had not yet come for its total rehabilitation among its Arab neighbors.

Just the same, there are those who believe that a sea change is taking place in Iran.

At a recent international congress held in Florence, Italy, a panel of Middle East experts suggested that Iran has already taken steps to put portions of the Islamic Revolution behind it.

Canadian companies get boost from exhibition in Israel

By EDGAR ASHER
Israel Correspondent

TEL AVIV — A Royal Canadian Mounted Policewoman, complete with ceremonial scarlet uniform and mounted on a horse on loan from the Israel Police, set the scene and greeted visitors arriving at the recent Canadian Tourism Commission promotion at Tel Aviv's Sheraton Hotel. It was the first time the commission launched such a wide-ranging promotion in Israel.

The aims were to encourage tourism to Canada and make Israelis aware of the many Canadian companies, from consumer products to hi-tech, doing business in Israel.

Canada's ambassador to Israel, David Berger, and Tel Aviv Mayor Roni Milo cut a ceremonial ribbon leading into the hotel's exhibition suite, to reveal displays from each of Canada's provinces.

In the centre of the hall was a huge circular table with an array of Canadian food products and wines specially prepared by the Canadian Olympic winning chef, Theodore Reader.

The event was jointly sponsored by the Canadian Embassy and the Canadian Tourism Commission in cooperation with Air Canada, the Greenberg Food Chain (an Israeli supermarket chain) and the Tel Aviv Sheraton Hotel.

"Since we inaugurated our direct flights from Israel to Canada in June 1995, this has become one of our fastest growing and most popular routes," said Ruth Ben Tsur, Air Canada's director of operations in Israel.

"At first we only had two flights per week, but such was the demand and popularity of our service that we soon increased this to the present level of six direct flights per week. From next May, we will be increasing yet again, this time to seven flights per week. Israeli businesspeople like to fly our airline, because apart from enjoying the quality of our service and more space on our aircraft, they find that Toronto is an ideal destination for all connections in the United States," she said.

One of the Canadian consumer success stories is the market penetration of the Canadian food company Loblaw's, whose brand names President's Choice and No Name are now familiar to customers of Greenberg, one of Israel's fastest growing supermarket chains.

"About 18 months ago, our company launched its products in Israel by introducing about 100 different lines. Today, Greenberg offers over 500 President's Choice products. Next year we are looking to double this figure," said Loblaw's David Olins.

"About 30 percent of our sales of President's Choice is from the sale of ketchup and ice cream," said Orit Greenberg, Greenberg's President's Choice product manager.

"Today we are selling more than $4 million of President's Choice products each year. Most of the Canadian products also carry a very strong kashrut certificate that is acceptable to nearly all our potential customers. We are sure that because of the quality and good prices of President's Choice it will become a brand leader in Israel," she said.

"In 1995, 48,000 Israelis visited Canada. Within a year of the Air Canada service starting, the figure jumped almost 50 percent, following an intensive advertising campaign in Israel," said Ellen Ruth Zeisler, a commercial counselor with the Canadian Embassy whose idea it was to hold the promotion.

"Today's promotion is to focus in on all the aspects of Canadian tourism and business. This year will see almost 90,000 Israelis visiting Canada as a result of our promotional efforts. We can see an increase of about 25 percent every year in the foreseeable future."

Woman gets Orthodox rabbi's tasks

By DEBRA NUSSBAUM COHEN
Jewish Telegrapic Agency

NEW YORK — An Orthodox synagogue, for the first time, has hired a woman to work as a rabbi — almost.

Manhattan's Lincoln Square Synagogue has hired Julie Stern Joseph to teach adult education classes, provide pastoral counseling and visit women in the hospital — roles often performed by a rabbi.

Both Stern Joseph and Lincoln Square's rabbi, Adam Mintz, in separate interviews, took pains to make it clear that hers is not a clerical position.

But this is the first time that an Orthodox synagogue has been known to create a staff position for a woman in which she takes on these tasks, which are permitted to women according to an Orthodox interpretation of Jewish law.

The congregation is carefully calling her post that of a "congregational intern," and not using the term "para-rabbi," which is employed in some non-Orthodox synagogues to describe people who fill much the same role.

In the Orthodox view of Jewish law, women may not be ordained.

The topic has been highly sensitive within centrist Orthodoxy recently, as women with sophisticated secular educations have been recognized to have the capacity and desire for opportunities to study Judaism's primary texts.

In the Orthodox world, the full-time adult study of Torah and Talmud has traditionally been available only to men.

Drisha, the institute for women's advanced Torah study, started more than 15 years ago in New York City, becoming one of the first to offer the same opportunity to women.

The slow proliferation of programs offering such study to women has created conflict between those that focus on women as mothers and wives, and those who see the possibility of talented woman working as religious leaders.

An independent program started this year by two rabbis who teach at the Yeshiva University-affiliated Stern College for Women, has come under fire in the centrist Orthodox community.

The Riverdale, N.Y.-based Torat Miriam educates women on a part-time basis to prepare them for non-rabbinic leadership roles within Orthodox institutions. But it has been rejected by some rabbis as beyond the bounds of what is permitted for women.

Such a climate has Stern Joseph very concerned about the way her part-time job at Lincoln Square will be perceived.

"There's no thought that this role will evolve into a rabbinic position for women, because if there was, then I wouldn't be involved with it," she said in an interview between classes at Drisha.

She is in her first year of full-time study in the institute's Scholar's Circle, which permits gifted women to study Talmud in the morning and Halachah, or Jewish law, in the afternoon.

The 24-year-old also studied for more than two years at Midreshet Lindenbaum, a Jerusalem yeshivah for women.

"I want to provide a role for women in the community," she said. "If these roles are halachically permissible, and I can maximize that, then great.

"Women often feel disenfranchised in a synagogue, and if I can bridge a gap between women and the rabbi, and at the same time help the rabbi, then that's very helpful."

Her new boss, Rabbi Mintz, said that despite worries that the new position would be controversial even at the flagship congregation of modern Orthodoxy, "the reaction from the community so far has been only positive."

Israel & the Jewish World

The Lebanese quagmire

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Israelis are quite a contentious lot, but they unanimously agree that this has been a disastrous year for Israel in Lebanon.

Israel lost 39 soldiers in combat in Lebanon in 1997, the highest toll since 1985. The figure excludes 73 people killed aboard two helicopters that collided in midair last February en route to Lebanon.

Mideast Analysis

The arithmetic in Lebanon – Israel's last active war front – is simply appalling. According to official figures, 217 Israeli soldiers have fallen since the security zone was established almost 13 years ago. Add to this the more than 600 fatalities Israel sustained during the 1982 Lebanon War, and the scores who died between the ceasefire and Israel's withdrawal in 1985, and the scale of the debacle becomes readily and painfully apparent.

If there was a single incident that symbolized Israel's travails in Lebanon in 1997, it was the catastrophic raid launched by Israeli naval commandos against an enemy base south of Sidon last September.

Caught in a deadly ambush shortly after landing, 12 Israelis, including a doctor, were annihilated in a firestorm of bullets. The humiliation was compounded when newspapers published a gory photograph of a vainglorious Lebanese militiaman holding aloft the severed head of an Israeli commando who had been blown to bits.

This fiasco, probably the worst in the annals of the Israeli armed forces, reignited a nationwide debate over the wisdom of Israel's military presence in Lebanon.

Despite their superior fire power, Israel and its ally, the South Lebanon Army, are struggling in southern Lebanon, fighting a tough, resourceful and increasingly confident foe – Hezbollah – armed by Iran and supported by Syria.

Cognizant of the grim realities on the ground, Israel has offered to withdraw on condition that Hezbollah is disarmed and the border can be kept quiet. But neither Syria nor its protectorate, Lebanon, is interested in Israel's terms. What they demand is a unilateral and unconditional Israeli pullout. In the absence of a viable settlement, Syria conducts a war of proxy against Israel through its surrogate, Hezbollah, whose newly acquired long-range Katyushas can hit virtually any target in Israel.

As might be expected in a cabinet full of individualists, the issue has sharply divided the Israeli government. Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai contend that Israel cannot vacate the security zone until an agreement is reached with Lebanon and Syria.

However, Foreign Minister David Levy has called for "a fundamental assessment," while Infrastructure Minister Ariel Sharon has declared that Israel should revise its strategy or set up a timetable for leaving Lebanon.

By contrast, Agriculture and Environment Minister Rafael Eitan believes Israel should expand the security zone. His idea has been dismissed as a non-starter likely to embroil Israel even deeper in the Lebanese quagmire.

Last July, Mordechai urged France to lead a multinational force which would gradually replace Israeli troops in Lebanon. France rebuffed Israel, saying the proposal could only be feasible if the Golan Heights – which Syria wants to regain from Israel – was included in the package. Since the present Israeli government does not want to cede the Golan, Mordechai's plan was a dead letter.

Lebanon is also a divisive issue in the Israeli army. Chief of Staff Gen. Amnon Shahak clearly opposes a unilateral withdrawal, arguing that it would bring the war closer to Israel's northern border. Yet the commander of Israeli forces in Lebanon, Gen. Amiram Levine, has reportedly recommended a gradual pullout, with or without an accord with Lebanon and Syria.

Ehud Barak, leader of the Labor party, takes a cautious approach, his view being identical with Netanyahu's. Yossi Beilin, Barak's rival, has advocated a unilateral withdrawal over a six month period and the strengthening of border defences to prevent infiltration across the frontier.

So the debate rages on, bereft of hard and fast conclusions.

Unemployed launch protest

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Rising unemployment in Israel has brought warnings that a "social explosion" is imminent.

The predictions were borne out when laid-off workers recently took part in violent protests in the southern development town of Ofakim.

The protests took place one day after official figures showed a 1.2 percent rise in unemployment in November.

The statistics, which indicated that 151,600 Israelis were out of work, put unemployment at its highest levels in five years.

The unemployment figures indicated that 15 towns and settlements have more than ten percent unemployment rates, and that development towns in the Negev have been particularly hard-hit.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu appointed an emergency team to look into the matter of rising unemployment.

In the Knesset, the opposition Meretz faction introduced a motion of no-confidence in the prime minister over the economic picture.

Israeli chief rabbi calls for religious dialogue

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Israel's chief rabbis are conducting a foreign policy of their own.

Sephardi Chief Rabbi Eliyahu Bakshi-Doron sent a letter to Muslim leaders in Iran requesting that they meet with rabbis in order to create a dialogue between religious leaders throughout the Middle East.

In his letter, he called for an end to all hostile activity between Jews and Muslims, the Israeli daily Yediot Achronot reported.

Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat brought the letter to Tehran when he attended an Islamic summit there last week, Yediot reported.

According to other reports, the Iranian clerics responded positively to the letter, and an interfaith meeting involving rabbis and Iranian clerics may be held in a North African country in a matter of weeks.

Meanwhile, Israel's chief Ashkenazi rabbi has gone on a peace mission to Egypt.

Rabbi Yisrael Meir Lau held talks this week with Egyptian religious leaders during which they condemned terrorism and pledged to use their spiritual authority to promote moderation.

Met with Mubarak

The Grand Sheik of Al-Azhar, Mohamed Sayyed Tantawi, also said in published remarks that he asked Lau to advise Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu "to fulfil international and bilateral agreements" so that "the whole region does not face a catastrophe."

Lau, who also met with Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak, was the first Israeli chief rabbi to visit Cairo while still in office.

An Israeli spokesperson said Lau told Mubarak and Tantawi that he hoped they visit Israel soon.

Observant Jew on the air at York U's CHRY

Ayal Senior

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It's no surprise that Ayal Senior talks like a philosophy student – he's already in his third year of studying the subject at York University. But somehow one wouldn't expect his observant Jewish lifestyle and involvement in experimental music to jibe.

"You really have to be on top of your game and be really comfortable with your Jewish identity" said the 20-year-old music director of York's CHRY Community Radio (105.5 FM) in an interview at the on-campus station. "It's unique to our generation that people are open to understanding that. At CHRY, differences are encouraged."

An alumnus of United Synagogue Day School, raised in an observant Conservative home, Senior decided a few years ago to deepen his personal observance.

To the best of his knowledge, he's the first visibly observant – that is, kippah-wearing – Jew to work at the station. (He's not the only Jewish on-air personality; Shimon Zer-Aviv hosts Israel Today on Sundays.)

In addition to Senior's responsibilities as music director, he hosts a music show Wednesday nights from midnight to 2 a.m.

"My interests for the most part are within the realm of changing the way people think about art in general – visual arts, audio arts, it's all connected," said Senior. "This hasn't been attempted by a visibly Jewish, observant Jew."

But at the same time, he acknowledged, his music-related activities may also be changing people's notions of what's acceptable for an observant Jew.

"There are all these ideas of what a Jew should be. There isn't really much encouragement for seeking out a different way of thinking."

Although he hasn't been discouraged in his musical ventures, he has met with much curiosity about who he is as a Jew and as a person. "Ultimately they're the same questions I have to ask myself, completely existential questions."

According to his "somewhat truthful, indeterminate non-essentialist biography," Senior has been volunteering at CHRY since he was 16 and was hired as music director two years ago.

His only formal musical training was in the form of guitar lessons, which he dropped after a few weeks, preferring to jam with friends. As a young teen, he played guitar in a band with a group of friends.

Senior broadened his creative horizons earlier this year when he released a CD by New York-based "underground icon," musician Arthur Doyle. The CD launched Senior's label, Ain Soph (Hebrew for "there is no end"). Doyle shares his philosophy that music connects all people, Senior explained.

His CD label, he said, "tries to deal with all music from a Jewish theological philosophical understanding."

He also has a mail-order cassette label, Radio 3 Witness, specializing in experimental music cassettes.

Musically, Senior has been influenced by artists like the late John Lennon, "who believed sounds are all around us and within us. Sound is Ain Soph. It's everywhere."

He likes to buy limited edition recordings in specialty stores – music created by "real artists for people to talk about rather than something created strictly to entertain."

Senior is also interested in traditional Jewish liturgical music and klezmer, and has played the latter on his show.

"The music isn't the important thing. It's the idea, the concepts, the human experience. It helps you – like all art – find out about yourself, and it helps you find out who you aren't."

Images prints special edition

TORONTO — To celebrate both the 50th anniversary of the Jewish student press in Toronto and Images' chai anniversary, Images has printed a special edition that includes current contributions and reprints of articles from the past.

The first Jewish student publication in Toronto, the Hillel Scribe, appeared 50 years ago in October 1947.

Its successor, the Hillel-Lite was more of a "news" paper and it was often accompanied by the Hillel Social News. It in turn was followed by a publication called Masada, which changed its name to Migdal, to JUST News, and then to Rolling Scroll. Rolling Scroll finally evolved into Images, which was first released in October 1979 – 18 years ago.

Some of the older articles are still poignant today, some seem ironic. Some remind us of our struggles as Jews in the past 50 years.

Looking through the Jewish student press archives, I noticed that the 'old' news was often about Russian Jewry, Syrian Jewry, Ethiopian Jewry and Anatoly Sharansky. I also saw 'old' news that is still current news: about neo-Nazis, missionaries, Middle East terrorism. Will our 'news' items of today be relevant in the future? Will we still be talking about intermarriage, hate on the Internet, Jewish in-fighting and assimilation?

If you or someone you know is interested in getting involved with the Jewish student press in Toronto, please contact editor-in-chief Dave Gordon at 631-8053, or Jewish Campus Services at 785-1465.

"Just Between Us"

שישאר ביננו

גידי קורן וחברים

פול אוסטר:

כשאדם מהגר ועוזב מתרבות אחת לאחרת, הוא מאבד חלקים רחבים מהאישיות שלו. יד על הלב: כמה פעמים בשבוע אתם לא מבינים ממה אנשים צוחקים בטלביזיה? וכמה סופרים קנדיים קראתם בחייכם? קחו אותי למשל: ברפואה השפה שלי עשירה כמו של עמיתי המקומיים ואף כתבתי ספרים והרבה מאמרים רפואיים. אבל תראו לי עשרה צמחי בר ואני בספק אם אדע את שמם של שניים מהם, ועשר ציפורים ואולי אדע אחת. ובארץ ידעתי להגדיר מאות פרחים ועשרות ציפורים... יד על הלב: כמה מאיתנו קוראים ספרות אמריקניתקנדית במקור? ואם קוראים- כמה מילים בכל שורה אנחנו לא מבינים? אז מה נשאר לעשות? פשוט לקרוא אותם מתורגמים לעברית. למזלנו מאות ספרים כאלה יוצאים בכל שנה. ועכשיו סוף סוף אני מגיע לעיקר. לפני דקות ספורות, בגובה שלושים אלף רגל סיימתי לקרוא את אחד הספרים הכי מדהימים שקראתי מימי - "מר ורטיגו" של פול אוסטר. פול אוסטר, יליד 1947, הוא אחד הסופרים הכי חשובים והיותר מצליחים כיום בכל העולם, ומספר ספרים שלו תורגמו לעברית ("מוסיקת המקרה", "טרילוגיה ניו- יורקית", "לוויתן"). אני נדלקתי עליו בסרט Smoke שהיה בנוי על פי מספר סיפורים שלו ועסק בחנות טבק קטנה בניו-יורק והסיפורים של הקליינטים שלה. מה שאהבתי שם זה היכולת הנהדרת שלו לספר סיפור, אך בעיקר את אהבת האדם שלו. בכל הניכור והאכזריות של ניו יורק הוא מוצא אנשים טובים שעושים מעשים טובים. אין דבר יותר מדליק מאנושיות במקום שלא מצפים לה. מר ורטיגו- אותו דבר. ספר מדהים על ילד עזוב (נוצרי) שנאסף על ידי יהודי מסתורי שמלמד אותו לעוף, וכל עליותיו ומורדותיו. הספר נקרא בנשימה עצורה, עם המון אנשים רעים אבל כמה טובים שלא תשכחו הרבה זמן. הספר כתוב על ידי אוסטר באנגלית מדוברת של היום, והמתרגמים עשו עבודה נפלאה כשמצאו סלנג עברי שמתאים לאנגלית העכשווית של אוסטר. כשאתם נוסעים בפעם הבאה לארץ, או שמישהו בא לבקר, או סתם רוצה לפנק אתכם: השם הוא פול אוסטר. תתחילו עם "מר ורטיגו", אחר כך "מוסיקת המקרה", ואחר-כך! ממילא תהיו מכורים ולא יהיה לסדר הספרים שום חשיבות.

לפני מספר חודשים מצא צוות של מחפשים עקשניים שרידים של מטוס ישן ובו זוהו גופותיהם של שלושה אנשי צוות אויר קנדיים שנחשבו נעדרים מזה חמישים שנה. עכשיו, בטקס הקבורה, עומד גבר בן חמישים וארבע שאביו נעדר מאז היותו בן שנה והוא אומר: "תמיד חשבתי, קיוויתי, חלמתי, שאולי יום אחד תיפתח הדלת ואבא יאמר: חזרתי" . ללמדך שהילד שבתוכנו ממשיך לחיות כל החיים ומי שמתעלם ממנו אינו מכיר את עצמו. וללמדך עד כמה השתנה העולם שאנו חיים בו, הוזמן לטקס האשכבה טייס הוורמרט שהפיל את המטוס הקנדי. עומד שם איש בן שמונים שהיה אז צעיר בעצמו וניסה למלט את חייו. הוא לחץ ראשון על החדק, ואילולא היה עושה זאת, היה אולי הטייס הקנדי נוכח בהלוויה שלו עכשיו.

Orna Gang:

Art expresses relationship with Israel

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Israeli-born Orna Gang's intricate weaving and mosaics express an intimate relationship with her homeland.

She questions the "obsessive" feeling that we have for the land. "What binds us to it and why do we fight over it? Why is it so hard to share the land?" she wants to know.

Through her pieces she is "letting go" of those special places that she says, used to be "solely mine." As well she is trying to examine the current situation in Jerusalem, where she lived for several years.

The beauty and uniqueness of Jerusalem, she affirms, comes from the combination of the three religions and their strong, if often inharmonious presence in the life of the city.

Gang, who now lives here with her husband and children, is from an Iraqi/Turkish Jewish background. From childhood, she was fascinated by her Turkish grandmother's traditional embroidery and later, as a guide for immigrant Jewish youth in a Judean desert program to help bond them to the land, she was influenced by the culture and handiwork of Bedouin women in the area.

In Toronto, she majored in textiles at the Ontario College of Art and Design and received the 1997 George A. Reid Scholarship Award, G&S Dye and Accessories Award, earned Honorable Mention, Amoco Textile Contract Fabric Competition and was Prize Winner in the Environmental Textile Competition.

Gang dyes all of her materials painstakingly by hand and using geometry in her patterns, can create order and "layers" – a process of building that relates to her version of mosaics – a decorative form very common in the history of the Holy Land, she observes.

In her weaving she always uses cotton, reminiscent of Israel's field crops.

To Touch Light, a double weaving in multicolored complex shadings, celebrates the humanity of people. The theme arises from a car accident in which her family was involved, when complete strangers sprang to their assistance.

Another weaving, optimistically entitled Faith in Unity, is composed of three panels signifying the proximity of the three major religions, Judaism, Islam and Christianity, which somehow coexist and maintain faith even amid the troubles in Jerusalem.

Gang's mosaics are particularly innovative. The individual "tiles" are actually fashioned from compressed, chemically treated junk mail affixed to similarly prepared newsprint – symbols of communication. Carefully hand dyed, they generally have the appearance of ancient remains uncovered by archeologists.

Two contrasting companion pieces, one simulating wanton wear, the other in its original clarity, show what disrespect and destruction will do when there is no coexistence.

Gang has exhibited at the Propeller Centre for the Visual Arts and the Ontario Crafts Biennial Juried Exhibition. From Jan. 15 to Jan. 31, 1998, she will participate in a Three People Show at the Ontario College of Art and Design Gallery,291 Dundas St. W south-east corner of Dundas and McCaul.

Ofra Harnoy supports Temple

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Temple Sinai scored a success at the recent Ofra Harnoy concert, a new way of raising money for youth education.

After 32 years of holding dinner draws to raise funds, Temple Sinai Brotherhood sponsored the concert, at which 400 people applauded the renowned cello artist.

Its success means that the Brotherhood will continue to subsidize scholarships, support trips for youth to Israel, and support summer programs at Reform camps, said brotherhood president Leonard A. Banks.

He thanked Frank Berns and Alvin Deskin, co-chairs of An Evening with Ofra.

For her part, Harnoy entered into the spirit of the night, attacking her instrument in the inimitable style that has become associated with her concerts.

The audience, by its response, showed its preference for her popular numbers, Liebeslied, Porgy and Bess, and Flight of the Bumble Bee, the latter her encore.

Her artistry was most apparent in Sonata in C Major, Opus 119, by Sergei Prokofieff, requiring difficult bowing and plucking. There was a sheer liquid and lyrical quality to some of its three movements, and at one point her touch was so light the music was almost below the hearing threshold.

She opened with a short piece, Song Without Words, by Paul Ben Haim, a slow, plaintive, evocative piece which was dependent on a skilful piano accompaniment by Derek Brampton.

In Prayer, by Ernest Bloch, a sombre composition, she showed her control of the instrument, allowing the music to rise to full-bodied pitch.

Surprisingly, Kol Nidre, by Max Bruch, turned out not to be the solemn, traditional piece expected, thanks to the pervasive light-fingered accompaniment.

Harnoy acceded to the composer's urging in Fourth Movement From the Sonata for Cello by Srul Irving Glick and played her instrument passionately.

Artist's works exude energy

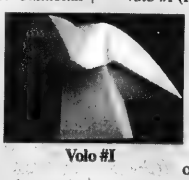
TORONTO — For over 23 years expatriate Pennsylvanian Shelley Robzen has been living and working in Pietrasanta, Italy, drawing inspiration from the international sculpture colony around her.

Robzen makes her Canadian debut at Gallery Louise Smith on Prince Arthur Avenue with a representation of elegant contemporary pieces in pristine Carrara marble. She also sculpts in bronze.



Volo #I

Serene, judiciously sensual, Robzen's works exude quiet energy. A carver, she releases form and life from within the marble mass.

Each of her sculptures currently featured at Gallery Louise Smith derives from a specific focus; each has its own appeal.

Wave #12 from her recent Wave/Landscape series, gently undulating, poses a fascination that grows with contemplation. Where does the water flow? How far will it travel? What will it carry?

Torso II's exquisitely balanced vertical and horizontal components reflect both the endurance and fragility of the human spirit and body.

Volo #I (Flight) is from a series conceived during a visit with friends on their farm just outside Chestertown, Md. Rising early each day, Robzen watched the birds soaring, wheeling and gliding in the open sky over land and water, and with unerring instinct, transformed static stone into a sense of freedom.

Her work has been exhibited in Italy, Hong Kong and the United States and is in museum collections at the Delaware Art Museum, Wilmington, and Museo dei Bozzetti, Pietrasanta. She is also represented in private collections.

CHAVA ROSENFARB TO BE HONORED

Montreal Yiddish writer Chava Rosenfarb, who is perhaps best known for Der Bojm Fun Lebn (The Tree of Life), her three-volume fictional epic on the Lodz ghetto, is due to be honored Dec. 28, 7 p.m. at the Bloor JCC, as part of a program connected to the annual conference of the Modern Language Association (MLA).

Born in Lodz in 1923, Rosenfarb is known to Yiddish readers around the world, but only with the recent translation of some of her works into English is she finding an English readership.

Dr. Goldie Morgentaler, Rosenfarb's daughter by her first marriage to Dr. Henry Morgentaler, is a literary scholar who has translated The Tree of Life and other of her mother's works into English.

The dinner honoring Rosenfarb is being sponsored by the American Association of Professors of Yiddish (a constituent group of the MLA) and by the literary journal Parchment and other Yiddish organizations.

The evening includes dinner (kosher under COR, with a fish or vegetarian option) and a program featuring a reading by Rosenfarb, an overview of her fiction by Goldie Morgentaler, a poetic tribute to Canada's Yiddish writers by Toronto's Simcha Simchovitch, and a performance by the Toronto Jewish Folk Choir.

The cost is $25 and all are welcome. For reservations, call Bess Shockett at 416-630-7222 or Adam Fuerstenberg at 416-979-5000, ext. 6137.

Film Fest News: The sixth annual Toronto Jewish Film Festival is still nearly six months away, but festival organizers have already announced that the theme of the popular cinematic shindig this year will be Israel At 50.

Numerous Israeli films and videos, features, shorts and documentaries will be prominent at the festival, which runs from May 7 through 14, 1998.

The festival is scheduled to open with Mark Harris' documentary The Long Way Home, a stirring story of the displaced Jews who, after World War II, began the long trek that eventually resulted in the establishment of the state of Israel.

Casting Call: Encore Entertainment and the Playhouse Project are seeking actors for a production of Guys and Dolls, to be performed at City Playhouse, Thornhill, from March 25 to April 5, 1998. Actors, singers and dancers ages 18 to 80 are required. Auditions are scheduled for Jan. 5, 7, 10 and 11. 416-733-0558.

LEGENDS OF KING SOLOMON

Legends of King Solomon by Aviva Ravel has been touring schools for two years and recently presented 17 performances at Toronto day and afternoon schools. They are performed by Bob Burns, Terry Simpson, Florence Schreiber and Alison Muir. The stories are imaginative, colorful, often humorous and teach the children about human behavior, human foibles, ecology and kindness to humans and animals. Carlebach's CD includes songs by her father

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to the CJN

TORONTO — Following in her father's footsteps as a soul singer, Neshama Carlebach recently captivated more than a thousand people at her solo concert held at the West Side Institutional Synagogue in New York City.

The concert coincided with the launching of her only recording with her late father, Reb Shlomo Carlebach, known to many as the Singing Rabbi.

The recording titled HaNeshama Shel Shlomo was finished two weeks before her father died in 1994 at age 69.

The 23-year-old York University student says she and a group of technicians restructured and re-recorded parts of the tape and CD which include three solos by Reb Shlomo (as he is known worldwide), two of which have never before been recorded; three solos by Neshama; and seven songs that they harmonize together.

The record includes such favorites as, Ein K'Elokeinu, Haneshama Lach, YHi Shalom, David Melech Yisrael, Asher Bara, and Eliyahu Hanavi.

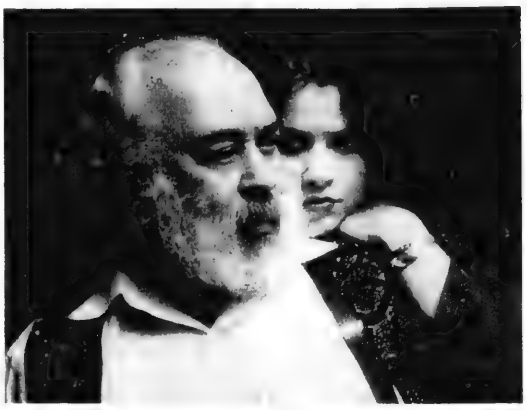
Dedicating the record to his daughter, Shlomo Carlebach said, "Neshamale, I bless you with all your songs, you make the world more beautiful."

Neshama says, "This album is a culmination of our love and our five years of singing together. Releasing this recording has been the most intense experience of my life, and definitely the greatest accomplishment of my life so far.

"I feel that I am in the world for a reason — to continue to keep him alive, and singing his music is the greatest privilege. I thank G-d every day for the honor of having known him, and for being a part of his holy work."

The charismatic Reb Shlomo, who wrote more than 5,000 songs, first invited his daughter to sing with him at a concert in Phoenix, Ariz.when she was 15. She appeared with her father on numerous concert tours to both Jewish and non-Jewish audiences, in many cities in the United States, Israel, Morocco, Austria and Slovakia.

After her father's death, she traveled extensively on her Rabbi Shlomo Carlebach Memorial Tour, singing her father's music and telling his stories. "People throughout the world know his songs but they don't know they are Shlomo's melodies."



Reb Shlomo and his daughter Neshama Carlebach.

She explained that her father used the words from prayers and psalms for his chassidic melodies. "His music is sung and played in synagogue services, at simchahs and on the concert stage."

She says that when the Pope visited New York recently, at a benediction for 100,000 people, the opening song was Shlomo Carlebach's L'maan Achai V'erayai (Because of My Brothers and Friends). "One of the Pope's assistant's told me that my father's music was well loved at the Vatican, and they mourned his passing."

In 1996, Neshama made her first solo recording of her father's music titled Neshama (Soul). This was followed by a recording of her father's stories and songs that she made with her mother.

Neshama has been recognized internationally as a singer whose performance, like her father's, is a vehicle for transmitting love and a spiritual message.

An Orthodox rabbi, Shlomo Carlebach felt that a man hearing a woman singing could be viewed more leniently in today's society.

At a concert, her father would announce when Nashama would be singing, and anyone could be excused from the hall and be told when to return.

She says that her father felt that Judaism was in crisis. She recalls that her father would say, "My daughter is bringing a whole new generation of young people back to Yiddishkeit — to bring back one soul to Yiddishkeit is important.

"If all of the Yiddish kids were in a shul and observing Yiddishkeit, my daughter wouldn't have to sing. But she is influencing and opening the hearts of a whole new generation."

Deconstructing Harry

Allen explores Jewish themes with gusto

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Woody Allen's newest film, Deconstructing Harry, explores Jewish sub-themes with gusto and with a depth of intensity.

In this finely-wrought comedy, which he has written and directed, Allen touches on interrelated topics running the gamut from faith, tradition and assimilation to the Holocaust and Israel.

As usual, the main character is a neurotic, talkative and secular New York Jewish intellectual seething with inner turmoil. As portrayed by Allen himself, Harry Block is a moderately successful but angst-ridden and spiritually empty novelist who has gone through several wives and numerous psychiatrists.

In terms of personality and predicament, Block bears a sneaking resemblance to autobiographical figures we have seen and empathized with before. But in this case, Allen's tendency to fall back on familiar faces is hardly a disadvantage. Block is refreshingly alive and vital, while Deconstructing Harry, now at Cineplex Odeon theatres, plays out as one of Allen's finest movies in recent years.

The Jewish subtext unfolds in two amusing scenes and in one satirical cameo.

In the first scene, which takes the form of a flashback, Allen and his wife (Demi Moore) clash over two fundamental issues. Should they observe the Sabbath in a traditional manner, and should their son be called Hillel or Hilliard?

It's a hilarious segment, and Moore, who's usually associated with cheap and glittering screen molls, is surprisingly convincing as an American Jewish woman embracing Orthodoxy.

A harsher tone is struck when Block visits his observant sister and her husband, a sullen man who wears a kippah. As a couple, they come across as narrow, insular and self-satisfied. Allen, a liberal and a freethinker, uses them to suggest that organized religion is a divisive force and that Jewish caring should extend to non-Jews as well.

Block's sister's husband emerges as the most unsympathetic person in the film. He is obsessed with the Holocaust and appears to support the right-wing political agenda in Israel. (Almost a decade ago, Allen wrote a piece in The New York Times criticizing Israel for its response to the intifadah, or Palestinian uprising, in the territories).

Like Mordecai Richler, Allen can't resist poking fun at Jewish conventions and, I might add, at himself. A bar mitzvah reception which looks like a Star Wars set becomes the butt of light-hearted humor. And in a self-deprecating moment, Block, denying he is a self-hating Jew, claims he is merely a self-hating individual.

Making integration work

By ELAINE RUBINOFF
Special to The CJN

Until only recently, when a baby with special needs was born, the family's choices were limited.

Some babies were given up for adoption and many of the Jewish children went to non-Jewish families. Some were placed in institutions. Some were kept at home, but lived very sheltered lives. Some were brought into society but kept in segregated environments.

Today, the attitude towards people with special needs is changing. Laws have been enacted to promote the inclusion of people with physical, emotional and intellectual disabilities in employment, housing and education. People with special needs can be found in all walks of life. It is not uncommon for those with visible disabilities to be seen in the media and in advertisements. We are seeing not only a change in people's behavior towards those who are different, but a change in their attitudes as well.

Acceptance and tolerance of people who are different from ourselves are attitudes that cannot be passively taught. They need to be learned through the experience of working, learning and playing with others who are different from ourselves.

"We are often fearful of people with special needs because of the lack of opportunities and experiences we have interacting with them. We are more comfortable with what we know, and therefore something that may be different challenges us," says Selma Elzas, of Jewish Family & Child Services.

In order to develop a more positive attitude, Elzas says, it is important to keep in mind that we are all born b'tzelem Elokim, in the image of HaShem. As well, Ethics of Our Fathers (4:27) teaches us, "Don't look at the container, but rather see what is inside."

The day school system in Toronto is beginning to take important steps to include children with special needs in mainstream classes. More and more, we are seeing children with disabilities working alongside their peers. It is no longer unusual to see a child in a wheelchair being pushed down the halls by a classmate, or a peer-helper reading to a child with Down syndrome. In order for this to continue to happen, it is imperative that parents and educators promote the inclusion of children with special needs into the mainstream of society.

In his writings, 19th-century philosopher, Rabbi Samson Raphael Hirsch, discusses the importance of educating children together, within the same school, regardless of their abilities: "We must always remember that the true accomplishments of a school and its teachers are measured before G-d's [eyes] and in the eyes of any thoughtful observer by what they have been able to do for the less gifted students."

This statement is as valid today as it was when it was written over 125 years ago.

An excellent means of introducing mainstream children to the idea of befriending children with special needs is through books. The following is a sampling of children's books that can be found in libraries: The Diamond Bird, (about a young frum boy with Down syndrome); My Special Friend, (a Jewish boy with Down syndrome); He's My Brother, by J. Lasker (a child with learning disabilities); Russell is Extra Special: A Book About Autism for Children; Mom Can't See Me, by S.H. Alexander.

Several books by Jewish authors have been written from an adult's point of view. They include My Special Brother, by R. Shiff; A Child Like That, by R. Walburg; and The Journey With Joshua, by Naomi Meyer.

As well, there are several store catalogues that use many different types of children as models. A collage can be made with the pictures of the children in the catalogues.

Parents can encourage their children to befriend a child with special needs. Children need to invite each other to play in each other's homes and share in their parties or outings. A mother of a child with Down syndrome recently expressed her delight when her daughter was invited to a birthday party.

A family can "adopt" another family who has a child with special needs. Beside sharing in every day types of activities, they can share Shabbat and yamim tovim together. Everyone benefits tremendously from the experience. The non-disabled children not only learn to share and help others, but more importantly, they learn not to fear what is different. They learn that helping is giving as well as receiving. The children with special needs learn that they are an integral part of our society with a great deal to offer their peers. We are helping to create a better world when we make it a place in which everyone is included.

The suggestions in this article are excerpted from The Art of Teaching: Practical Strategies for Chinuch by Elaine Rubinoff, published by Feldheim Publishers.

Israel trains Palestinian medics

By SUSAN JACOBS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — Israel's emergency rescue service is training Palestinian paramedics and ambulance drivers.

The training program by Magen David Adom comes at a time of high tension between Israel and the Palestinians because of the stalled peace process.

Despite the problems with the political negotiations, Magen David Adom president, Dr. Shlomi Antebbi, agreed to a request from the chair of the Palestinian Red Crescent, Dr. Fathi Arafat, to train the Palestinians.

"Cooperation between the MDA and the Palestinian Red Crescent will create increased understanding between the two peoples," said Natan Kodinsky, director of training for Magen David Adom.

About 25 Palestinians are participating in the course. They will join the staff of the Palestinian Red Crescent, which operates in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip.

The course involves training in ambulance driving and equipment and medical treatment, including first aid in various emergency situations.

The three-week course began Nov. 30 and was held at the Holyland Hotel in Jerusalem. A senior Magen David Adom instructor is conducting the program in Arabic.

Beginners guides authored by certifiable sports mavens.

TORONTO — How "dum" do they think we are?

With their trademark yellow and black covers, the "Dummies" series of books are a familiar sight in any quality bookstore. If you're trying to get a handle on the latest computer system or trying to figure out what the heck the Internet is, the Dummies books may be for you.

But for hockey? For basketball?

Apparently the deep thinkers at IDG Books, publishers of all the ...for Dummies, think there's a market out there for a beginners guides to hoops and hockey, at $26.99 a crack.

Considering the intellectual levels of those who play the two sports and excel at them, you clearly don't have to be an intellectual giant to understand both games. Mind you, IDG publishes a Sex for Dummies book. So there's clearly no end to what people will buy if it's packaged properly. Perhaps we can expect Getting Out of Bed for Dummies next.

Having said all that, the two books aren't half bad, although trying to sell Hockey for Dummies in the Great White North might be like selling ice to Eskimos. If you haven't picked up the basics of the game through osmosis by the time you hit 10, where have you been? On the other hand, if you have been stuck in front of the tube or spending your time in other pursuits, you can learn something from these books.

Written by two certifiable sports mavens, former New York Rangers goalie John Davidson, now color commentator with the Madison Square Gardens Network, and Richard "Digger" Phelps, ESPN commentator and former University of Notre Dame head basketball coach, the books are certainly learned expositions on the two sports in question.

The basketball book features informative chapters on basketball fundamentals, explaining the technical aspects of skills like shooting and rebounding. There is also pretty thorough examination of the team aspect of the sport, such as playing the zone defence, the rotation defence, the pick and roll and other tactical areas of the game.

Interestingly, basketball and hockey share terminology on one type of popular defence – the trap. Although they sound the same, the basketball trap more closely approximates the left-wing lock in hockey.

In hoops, the trap is a version of the press defence, getting on the other team's ball-handler and trying to create a turnover by forcing the ball-handler towards the sidelines and stripping him of possession.

In hockey, the trap is generally played in the neutral zone between the blue lines. On the other hand, the left-wing lock, the defensive flavor of the month (but which has been used by Detroit coach Scotty Bowman since Moses was a boy), is similar to the basketball trap. It too is a pressing (forechecking) style of defence in which the centre and right wing move into the defensive zone and attempt to angle the puck carrier towards the left boards. The left winger and the two defencemen occupy the area between the centre red line and the opponent's blue line and jump on loose pucks generated by the aggressive forechecking.

That's about as technical as it gets, although there are explanations and illustrations of power play formations, defending the power play and the like.

Davidson adds some spice to an otherwise controversy-free book when he rates the 10 best games of all time. A reader might be prompted to ask, what was he smoking?

Some of the games clearly belong in the list, starting with the longest game of all time, a six-overtime period marathon between Montreal Maroons and Detroit Red Wings on March 24, 1936, that ended at 2:25 in the morning. (Today, they'd still be playing a regular season snoozefest on March 24.)

> Hockey's left wing lock has been used by Scotty Bowman since Moses was a boy

Other great games included the Leafs' last Stanley Cup win in 1967, an exciting Montreal Boston matchup from the Bobby Orr, Jean Beliveau era and the Montreal/Red Army New Year's Eve game of 1975.

Davidson calls the Montreal/Red Army game – a 3-3 tie – perhaps the greatest game ever played. Although the action was fast and furious, the Habs dominated completely, outshooting the Russians 39-13. Only Tretiak's outstanding goaltending kept the Russians in the game. The bad guys scored three goals on 13 shots. Is it some Canadian trait that gives the other team so much credit when they were completely outclassed? What's so great about dominating another team and coming away with a tie?

Other games that Davidson rates as all-timers include a 1996 early round playoff game between Pittsburgh and Washington (neither of whom went on to win the Cup), and the Canada/Sweden 1996 World Cup playoff game.

Conspicuously missing from his list is any game from the 1972 Summit Series between Canada and the Soviets or Mario Lemieux's Canada Cup-winning goal in 1987. What was this guy thinking?

Here's a quiz, based on the Dummies books, to test your knowledge of basketball and hockey:

1. Who scored the game-winning goal in that 1936 NHL marathon?

2. Long before the Dream Team made its debut at the 1992 Olympics, the United States was a force in international basketball. It won the gold at the 1960 Olympics by scoring an average of 42.4 points per game. Who were the guards for that first "dream team"?

3. Who holds the NHL record for most goals in one game?

4. What was the average player salary in the NBA in 1996-97? Which team had the highest overall payroll?

5. Which skater scored the gold medal-winning goal in the overtime shootout at the 1994 Lillehammer Olympics?

Answers:

1. Modere "Mud" Bruneteau potted the winner on a pass from Hec Kilrea of the Red Wings. The Wings went on to defeat Montreal in the playoff series and then beat Toronto in the final to win the Stanley Cup.

2. The U.S. backcourt was led by Jerry West and Oscar Robertson, who went on to Hall of Fame careers in the NBA. The American string of 36 years of Olympic competitions without a loss came to an end in 1972 when the Soviets defeated them 52-51 in one of the most controversial games ever. The Soviets, trailing by one point with three seconds left and forced to inbound the ball under their own basket, got three chances to complete the play before scoring the winning points.

3. Joe Malone of the Quebec Bulldogs scored seven goals in one game in 1920.

4. The average NBA salary last year was $2.2 million, up from $249,000 in 1982-83. Chicago Bulls had the league's highest payroll, at $58.27 million. The Bulls paid superstar Michael Jordan $30 million for one season when he became a free agent in 1996-97. That sum (paid to a team's free agents) was exempted from the $24.3-million team salary cap set by the NBA.

5. Peter Forsberg got the winning goal, putting the puck past Canadian netminder Corey Hirsch.

The Inside Back

A special Chanukah quiz from the latke maven

By JORDAN MAX

Well, Chanukah is almost here, and if you're like me, you've been frying so many latkes that your moustache/beard/hair/toupee smells like a bonfire. It's time for a break, so put up your feet and see if you can correctly answer this special Chanukah Quiz.

Last Laugh

1. On Chanukah, we commemorate the victory of the Hashmonayim over the idolatrous Syrian-Greeks and the rejection of assimilation into the dominant culture by:
(a) Lighting a special menorah at night displayed in our front window, eating and gambling for nuts;
(b) Buying elaborate, expensive gifts for the entire family, friends and acquaintances because it's the "holiday season;"
(c) Donating a really lovely bronze plaque and hosting a community gala dinner in honor of the Hashmonayim family.

2. There was only a single vial of olive oil left for the menorah in the Beit Hamikdash because:
(a) Upon cleaning out the defiled Temple, they found only one vial of oil with the kohen gadol's stamp on it left fit for use;
(b) The price of olive oil on the Shemen Index in the Asian Futures spot market had recently climbed by 10 percent and the local oil broker was waiting for a price drop to buy;
(c) That re-engineering consultant chacham had convinced Temple management to switch over to a just-in-time delivery system just as the postal service went on strike.

3. The letters nun, gimel, hay, shin on the dreidel represent the phrase:
(a) Nes Gadol Haya Sham (a great miracle happened there), referring to the miracle mentioned in question 2 above;
(b) Never Give Harold a Shekel, referring to your third cousin's brother-in-law who still hasn't returned your cordless power drill since Sukkot two years ago;
(c) Newest government hair-brained scheme (pick one).

4. The real reason behind the consumption of vast quantities of latkes and deep-fried soufganiot on Chanukah is to:
(a) Remind us of the miracle of the oil lasting eight days, which is coincidentally the length of time it will take to burn off the excess calories through continuous running on the treadmill;
(b) Build up sufficient fat reserves to last us through the long Canadian winter hibernation, which usually ends sometime around Shavuot;
(c) Use up the 10 extra pounds of matzah meal you bought (just in case you ran out) last Pesach.

5. The song Maoz Tsur (Rock of Ages) traditionally sung after lighting candles, refers to:
(a) G-d;
(b) Aging rock and roll stars who will soon be drawing pensions;
(c) Aunt Sadie's (in)famous matzah balls.

6. Yehudah HaMacabee's brothers were:
(a) Yonatan, Yochanan, Eliezer and Shimon;
(b) Larry, Curly, Moe and Shepp;
(c) Jerry, George, Kramer and Newman.

7. The rebellion against King Antiochus by the Jews led by the Hashmonayim was about:
(a) The restrictions on the open practice of Judaism and the desecration of the Beit Hamikdash;
(b) Coercive and anti-democratic education reform;
(c) the ban on sales of uncolored margarine in containers labelled only in Hebrew.

8. The Al Hanissim prayer recited in daily t'fillot and Birkat Hamazon on Chanukah, which mentions the victory of the few over the many, refers to:
(a) The ability of a small group of untrained, ill-equipped Jewish soldiers to rout the Greek-Syrian armies from the Beit Hamikdash and Eretz Yisrael, with G-d's help; (b) The winning touchdown by "Big Al" Hanissim, quarterback of the Modi'in Hammers football team in the Matzah Bowl championship;
(c) The legendary Alan H. Nissim, chartered accountant to the sages, the first person to successfully challenge a tax authority ruling.

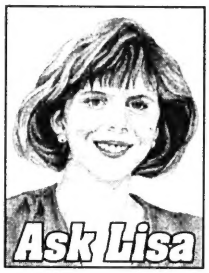
About jobs



Dear Lisa,

My wife has decided to open her own business. I completely support her, but I am a bit worried how this will affect our family. I work normal business hours and have come to rely on her being able to run errands and care for the kids at lunch and after school. Do you have any suggestions on how we can cope?

Dear Reader,

Many other couples have been where you are now. Perhaps you could speak with some of these couples. Contact your local business association for some names.

Other people to talk to include social workers and business consultants. These people can offer useful and important advice, but make sure they are trained in working with couples or they may be unable to take into account the situation you share with your partner.

Another place to turn is the bookshelf. Many of us are more comfortable reading about people we never see than we are sharing stories in person. The best book I have come across is Honey I Want to Start My Own Business by Azriela Jaffe.

This book helps entrepreneurs and their spouses formulate important questions to consider when embarking upon a business venture.

It also offers some suggested solutions that will give you an idea of the complexities involved in maintaining a marriage while being self-employed.

Honey I Want to Start My Own Business also offers a long and recent list of resources.

Finally, I believe the most important consideration is your wife. She is lucky to have a partner as concerned as you seem to be. Is she aware of your concerns? Make sure you talk with her and let her know how you feel. Have you two discussed how her becoming an entrepreneur will affect your family? Are you ready to help her and do you know what she will want from you?

Statistics show the number of people starting their own business is growing. So while you may feel as if you are alone today, wait a few years and you will see many more home-based businesses growing around you.

Job Search is a monthly column by career educator Lisa Galet Klug. Readers are invited to send any questions they have for Lisa to The CJN.
